The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont insists upon the point of order, and objects to the consideration of the bill under the private call. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will be returned to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER-YACHT QUARANTINE.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2692) to change the name of the schooner-yacht Quarantine to Welcome; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the schooner-yacht Quarantine, owned by Michael J. Driscoll, of Boston, and to issue a register under the name of Welcome.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Clerk to read the petition.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States assembled:

The petition of Michael J. Driscoll, of Boston, Massachusetts, shows that in June, 1871, he became the owner of the schooner Quarantine, of the city of Boston, measuring 23.5 tons, and having two masts; that he uses her solely for pleasure purposes and in the local waters of Boston harbor; that her name is associated with disease, and is a serious hinderance to his business and an injury to his property. Wherefore he asks that her name may be changed to Welcome.

MICHAEL J. DRISCOLL.

BOSTON, February 11, 1874.

Sworn before me.

JOHN RUSSELL,
Justice of the Peace.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIG HATTIE EATON.

Mr. CONGER also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register and enrollment to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton, which brig was repaired in an American port, and became the property of an American citizen in payment of the expense of said repairs.

Mr. CONGER. In the case of the vessel named in the bill a bottomry bond was given to citizens of the United States who advanced money for repairs of the vessel after its shipwreck at a point outside the United States to the amount of $7,000. After the return of the vessel to the United States she was repaired to the amount of between eight and nine thousand dollars in Boston and New York. The case comes within that class of cases in which the committee have recommended favorable action in the granting of a registry under our laws on account of the ownership of the vessel by American citizens and the extent of repairs. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a statement made by Messrs. Addison, Gage & Co., of Boston, in regard to the sums expended by them in repairs and labor upon the brig Hattie Eaton. It appears that this brig was built at Saint John, New Brunswick, and was purchased in 1865 by Francisco Rodrigues, a Portuguese subject residing at Demerara, British Guiana, the register standing, however, in the name of Charles Hollingsworth, a British subject in the service of Rodrigues, who employed the vessel in business between Boston and Demerara. In a voyage from the latter port to Boston, in 1871, she was seriously damaged by heavy weather and put into Saint George's, Bermuda, where she was repaired at an expense of $12,938.96, gold, which was advanced by the applicants. Upon a settlement on general average papers by all parties interested in 1872, the vessel was found indebted to the applicants in the sum of $9,028.26, currency, which sum by authority of Rodrigues was secured to them on a bottomry bond. In 1872 the vessel returned, after further repairs by applicants, to Demerara, and Rodrigues being unable to meet the bond, she was sold at public auction and bought in by agents of the applicants under instructions not to exceed $7,000 in gold in the purchase. She returned to New York in February, in 1873, the register standing in the name of a member of the firm that acted as agents of the applicants, but a British subject. During the ownership of Rodrigues, and since the purchase at auction in Demerara, the applicants allege that they have expended upon her in the aggregate the sum of $8,238.11, all in the employment of American labor.

If the statement submitted be intended to be presented as a basis for the issue of an American register or enrollment, I must say that it affords no ground for the authorizing of such papers by this Department. But in view of the large sum expended upon her by the applicants, which seems to have exceeded her market value, the case appears to be one similar to many others in which relief has been very properly granted by Congress, and in which that body has authorized the issue of American papers.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

HON. SAMUEL HOOPER,
House of Representatives.

The committee are of the opinion that this is an exceptional case in which it would be proper to grant relief. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMPHIS AND KANSAS CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. BUNDY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2200) to declare the Memphis and Kansas City and the Kansas City and Memphis Railroad military and post roads, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that that bill makes an appropriation of public property.

The SPEAKER. The bill is liable to two points of order: one is that it is a public bill, and the other that it proposes to appropriate public property.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Well, I make both points.

The SPEAKER. On the first point the bill is not before the House. Public bills cannot be reported on this call.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 334) to remove the disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2547) for the removal of the political disabilities of Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS RIDGWAY.

Mr. CLYMER, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1691) for the relief of Thomas Ridgway.

The bill was read. It confirms the title of Thomas Ridgway, late of Linn County, Missouri, to the northeast quarter of section 29, in township 58, in range 19 north, in Linn County, Missouri, and directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue and deliver to the legal representatives of said Thomas Ridgway, deceased, a patent for said land.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask for the reading of the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk from the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1874.

SIR: Referring to bill H. R. No. 1691, referred to this office for report, I have to state that the tract described in the bill, namely, northeast quarter, section 29, township 58, range 19 north, Missouri, was located by Thomas Ridgway with warrant in 1849, and the warrant was in transmission by mail lost, and has not been heard from since.

There is no other disposition of the tract shown by the records of this office; and I recommend the passage of the bill in its present form.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.,

W. W. CURTIS,
Acting Commissioner.

HON. H. CLYMER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. CLYMER. It appears by the letter of the Commissioner that this land was located in 1849 by a warrant, which warrant was transmitted to the person to whom it belonged, and was lost during its transmission. The Commissioner says that the bill is right, and the committee have therefore recommended its passage. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to remark, lest this should be drawn into a precedent in a similar case, that the bill was liable to a point of order, as it appropriates public property.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2245) to appropriate $1,000 for the purchase of a piece of land in the State of Florida; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2695) for the relief of Ely Cameron; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of War to correct the record in his Department, so as to remove the charge of desertion from Ely Cameron, a private in Company D, Thirty-fourth Regiment New York State Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON, from the same committee, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1253) for the relief of the heirs of George Fisher; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following petitions; which were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of John S. Evans, for the removal of the charge of desertion, &c.; and

The petition of Allamirah Bronson, asking pay and allowances for her deceased husband as a soldier of Company D, First Tennessee Light Artillery.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1193) for the relief of the estate of the late Major C. S. Underwood, paymaster United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

Mr. NESMITH, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1219) for the relief of Charles W. Barry, late private Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2696) for the relief of John F. Wheeler; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2697) to create an additional major of artillery, and to promote Captain James M. Robertson.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA INDIAN-WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2698) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the States of Oregon and California in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1872 and 1873; which was read a first and second time.

The bill requires the Secretary of War to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expenses claimed to be necessarily incurred by the States of Oregon and California, or the citizens thereof, for arms, ammunition, supplies and transportation, and services of the volunteer forces in the suppression of Indian hostilities in said States in the years 1872 and 1873, and to report the same to Congress at the next session, with the names of the persons who claim to be entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and sums upon which said report may be based.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reference to the Court of Claims of a claim against the Government has been held to come within the rule. I think this bill comes within the rule as involving an appropriation.

Mr. NESMITH. There is no appropriation in this bill. It merely directs the Secretary of War to ascertain certain facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the point is a good one.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NESMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been running more than an hour, I believe.

The SPEAKER. That may be; but the morning hour never closes till it is terminated by the coming up of some business more highly privileged.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour of half-past one having arrived, the morning hour expires, and the bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency, which is the special order at this hour, comes up for consideration.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that bills on the Speaker's table may be taken up and referred, so that the committees may be able to act on them.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, bills on the Speaker's table will be taken up for reference.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM L. CABELL.

The first bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 334) to remove the disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be taken up and passed.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PENSION BILLS REFERRED.

The following Senate bills were severally taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

A bill (S. No. 245) for the relief of William Rood, late a private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers;

A bill (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey;

A bill (S. No. 566) granting a pension to Lucinda Schrum, a widow of Jacob R. Schrum, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers;

A bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers; and

A bill (S. No. 568) granting a pension to Hugh P. Lytle, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 212) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use, for the removal of the Kickapoos and other Indians, on the borders of Texas and Mexico, to the Indian Territory, and for their support after such removal, the unexpended balance of appropriations made for the above purpose by acts approved July 15, 1870, and March 3, 1871; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought that bill had passed both Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing about it. It will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TERRITORIAL COURTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:
And that this act shall not apply to cases now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States where the record has already been filed.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have considered this amendment, and desire that it may be concurred in.

Mr. COX. What bill is this?

Mr. POLAND. It is a bill concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom. It has been drawn by a member of the Supreme Court.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I should like to hear some explanation of this matter from the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. POLAND. I am willing to make an explanation of the matter if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. If it takes time the Chair will have to return the bill to the Speaker's table.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. We ought not to act on this subject without some explanation.

The SPEAKER. The bill and amendment of the Senate will be returned to the Speaker's table.

Subsequently,

Mr. G. F. HOAR said: Mr. Speaker, allow me to say, in regard to the bill sent to the Speaker's table on my objection, that I have since then read the bill, and am willing to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other objection to taking the bill concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom from the Speaker's table and concurring in the amendment of the Senate?

There was no objection, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider all the votes taken this morning; and also to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a preamble and resolution for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAYNARD. If it takes time I will be obliged to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the dimensions of foreign immigration to the United States have made it a matter of national importance and concern, and the bulk of such immigration passes through the port of New York where, by the operation of local laws, it is made subject to a capitation tax ostensibly levied for the protection of the people of the State from the influx of foreign population and to the more effectual guarding of the immigrants themselves; and whereas such capitation taxes, coming as they do from the pocket of the immigrant, are regarded with suspicion and dislike by a large part of the country, and by all commercial and business interests, as oppressive to the immigrant and tending directly to check immigration, and should, if imposed at all, be imposed by Congress for the benefit of the whole country and not of a single State; and whereas the present board of commissioners of immigration of the State of New York is seeking an increase of the capitation tax from $1.50 to $2, although such increase is opposed by leading interests in that city, and the said board accused of culpable mismanagement and gross extravagance in the matter of salaries: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to investigate the manner in which the State of New York provides for the immigrant and disburses the amount collected in capitation taxes in rendering assistance restricted by State laws to the limits of the State; and that such committee be empowered to send for persons and papers, and be required to report without delay.

Mr. CREAMER. I object.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say to the House that it has been intimated to me by one or two persons they would like to speak on this bill to-night, and therefore, if during the morning a sufficient number can be found who are willing to speak to-night, I give notice that I will move to have an evening session for debate only.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to move that there be an evening session?

The SPEAKER. He did not make that motion, but he gave notice that if he found a sufficient number of members willing to speak to-night, he will, at a later period of the day, move for an evening session for debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope there will be an evening session for debate.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The House proceeds to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to say that I yield the remaining portion of my hour to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] after the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency have been heard.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not open to amendment, but the gentleman can have read what it is that he desires to offer.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. If I get an opportunity I propose to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 3, line 31, strike out "four hundred," and insert in lieu thereof "three hundred and fifty-six."

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I have prepared some remarks, Mr. Speaker, on that amendment; but inasmuch as I cannot get the floor I ask permission of the House to print them in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. (See Appendix.)

Mr. POLAND. I also desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 2, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for that purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as fast as practicable, to retire and cancel United States notes in any mode warranted by law, until the amount outstanding shall be reduced to $300,000,000; that as fast as United States notes shall be retired, circulating notes to an equal amount shall be issued to banking associations which may be duly organized under and in accordance with existing laws; and in authorizing such new banking associations, and issuing such circulating notes, preference shall be given to banking associations in such States as have not now their proper proportion of bank circulation; and when the amount of United States notes outstanding shall be reduced to $300,000,000, all banking associations formed under and in accordance with existing laws shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the manner now provided by law; and all acts limiting the amount of such circulation are hereby repealed.

Mr. DEWITT. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the recent action of the House in legalizing the issue of United States legal-tender notes to the extent of $400,000,000, it is none the less necessary that in considering the bill now before the House the monetary question should be discussed in all its bearings, both in reference to what the currency now is and what it ought to be.

While the few observations I am about to make will be to some extent general in their character, yet I trust they will be found to have a direct bearing on the bill under consideration.

The difficulty with which the subject of the finances and the currency is surrounded is only equaled by its importance.

It is true that of late extraordinary progress has been made in the study of political economy and in the elucidation of the principles underlying the production and distribution of a nation's wealth. Yet it is equally true that so subtile, and oftentimes remote, are the different influences to be considered, arising not only from the laws of trade but also from the still more uncertain movements of men, as they may be dictated by reason, interest, or feeling, that there is probably no science where there are so many differences of opinion, and consequently so many erroneous opinions, as in the science of political economy. Especially is this the case with that branch of it which refers to the currency, and which, on account of the events of the last few months, it is expected by the people that this Congress will most carefully consider.

NO LEGISLATION CAN PREVENT PANICS.

The opinion which is more or less prevalent in the minds of the people, that it is in the power of Congress to so regulate the circulating medium of the country as forever in the future to prevent a commercial crisis similar to that through which we have passed, may well be set down as a popular delusion. It matters not with what wisdom and care the laws regulating the currency are framed, and the innumerable contingencies which may arise, be foreseen and provided for, we can never by any enactments of ours so overrule the irrevocable, inevitable laws of political economy as to enable those who live beyond their incomes "to make both ends meet," or to insure profitable returns to those who invest their means in undertakings which can never pay interest. Such financial disasters have occurred in all commercial nations, and under very different circumstances, and they probably will continue to occur while human nature remains as it is. It is also likely that the more commercial a nation is, the more sharp and general will these revulsions be.

The producer of raw material sells it to the manufacturer, the manufacturer to the wholesale dealer, who in turn sells it to the retail dealer, and he to the farmer. There are hundreds and thousands of such chains in the business transactions of this country, and each link of the chain depends on the others. The inability of any one of the links in the chain to meet its liability creates distrust, and when distrust becomes general a panic ensues. Every man wants to get what is due him, being afraid that his debtors may fail; the deposits in the banks being payable on demand are most attainable, and a rush is made for them, to the great injury of the mercantile and manufacturing interests which have received assistance from the banks. Such panics have occurred from the failure of crops, whereby the farmer has been prevented from paying the retail merchant, who in turn could not pay the jobber, and so on.

Again, overproduction, or the falling off in demand, has rendered the manufacturer unable to dispose of his products, and thereby he has not only failed to pay what he owed to the producer of raw material, but has been under the necessity of reducing the number of his workmen, causing ruin and destitution to thousands. After a number of prosperous years the surplus of capital seeking investment becomes larger, and in consequence it is with more difficulty that it can be invested so as to bring in the large returns which it produced when there was less capital seeking investment. People then go out of the ordinary channels and seek for increased profits from all kinds of speculative and doubtful schemes. Much capital is thereby soon lost or sunk in enterprises which are not only non-productive, but from which it is impossible to get back the principal which has been put in; much movable, active capital becomes fixed and immovable, and of no use whatever in carrying on the business of the country.

We can each judge for himself which, if any, of these causes produced the collapse of last fall. Some have attributed it to the sinking of capital in building unproductive railroads through unsettled portions of the country; others see the cause in the large amount of funds lying idle during summer in our commercial centers, which idle money sought investment in speculations from which it could not be withdrawn without producing a crash.

However different our views may be as to the cause of the recent revulsion, we cannot but be unanimous that it is our duty to do all that is legitimately in our power to place the finances of the nation in such a shape as to discourage the return of such a disaster, and in case of their occurrence to render their duration as short as possible.

WHAT DID NOT CAUSE THE CRISIS.

As having an important bearing on the action to be taken by Congress, I cannot refrain from giving it as my opinion that our recent financial troubles were not caused by an insufficiency of currency. After the panic was fairly under way, and people were withdrawing currency and hoarding it, then the panic was no doubt aggravated by the scarcity of currency brought about by such action, and the desideratum of the hour was some means by which the gap made by the hoarded currency could be filled, some resource whence what had been withdrawn from circulation could be made good.

Had our currency been on a specie basis, and on a par with that of the specie-paying countries of Europe, we could soon have drawn from the clearing-house of the world enough to supply the vacuum caused by those who had withdrawn money for the purpose of hoarding it. But the gold which did actually come to us, notwithstanding the fact that our currency was not on a specie basis, was of no use; it could not pass into circulation. It may be questioned if its importation was not, as matters stood, an actual damage to us by causing a flurry in the London money market and leading the Bank of England to raise its rate of interest, and thereby reacting unfavorably on the money market here, and on the values of our exportable commodities.

WE HAVE TOO MUCH CURRENCY.

But the very fact that our currency is not at par with gold, shows that it is not only not too small in volume, but that it is actually excessive. Our dollar notes are promises to pay a dollar. Our laws define a dollar to be a coin of a certain weight and fineness. Our paper promises, if not excessive and depreciated, should be good for the coin whose name they bear. But that it may be still more apparent that a lack of currency was not the cause of our recent financial troubles, let us compare the amount of our present circulation with that of our own country before the war and with what it is in England at the present time.

The following table will show at a glance the population, wealth, and circulation in the United States in 1850, 1860, and 1870, and will completely set at rest any doubt as to whether our currency is excessive in quantity or not:

Year.	Population.	Assessed wealth.	Circulation.	Per head.
1850	23,764,706	$7,135,780,228	$150,000,000 notes. 100,000,000 coin.	$10 50
1860	31,127,000	12,084,560,000	200,000,000 notes. 150,000,000 coin.	11 30
1870	38,115,641	14,178,986,732	700,000,000 notes.	18 42

From the circulation of 1870, exclusively irredeemable paper, I make no deduction for so-called bank reserves, because those reserves, held against deposits, form a necessary part of the circulation of the nation, and are doing, in the coffers of the banks, duty as such equally with currency in the pocket of the citizen.

From this it appears that our circulation has been increased out of all due proportion to both our population and wealth.

By extending our research still further we would find that the note circulation of England to-day is actually less than it was in 1819 by $50,000,000, and amounts to only $6.50 per head of the population; the total increase of circulation being an increase of specie.

It is to be remembered, in comparing the circulation per capita of England with that of the United States, that the wealth of England is much greater than that of this country, and that a far greater proportion of it is in personal property, and so entering more largely into commercial transactions. Moreover, England is both the money and mercantile broker of all nations. A large proportion of the foreign trade of the United States is carried on through her.

CIRCULATION SHOULD NOT INCREASE IN THE SAME RATIO WITH WEALTH OR POPULATION.

If $11.30 per head of circulation were sufficient for this country in 1860, the same ratio ought to be sufficient now, for the reason that population and wealth increase faster than should circulation. Every year witnesses new modes of economizing circulation. Bills of exchange, checks, deposits, clearing-houses, telegraphs, railroads, and many other economizing devices and substitutes continually tend to lessen the work which circulation has to perform. The statistics of England are a most remarkable proof of this.

In 1819 the exports and imports were not twice the amount of note circulation; in 1844 they were about four times as much. In 1872 they were fourteen times as much. In 1844 the note circulation of England was £1.15*s*.8*d*. per head, while in 1872 it was £1.6*s*. per head, showing that the circulation keeps pace neither with the amount of business nor the increase of population or of wealth.

We no longer look to the volume of circulation to ascertain the increase or decrease of business, but to the transactions of the clearing-house. In 1844, the sums passed through the London clearing-house were only about forty times the amount of note circulation, while in 1872 they were one hundred and thirty-five times as large. The same is seen in our own country.

In 1837 the circulation of the banks of the United States was $149,000,000; in 1861 it was $202,000,000, being an increase of 35 per cent. By comparing this with the increase of wealth and population from 1840 to 1860, it will be seen that the increase of our population was 82 per cent., and of our wealth 330 per cent.; the one being more than twice as great as the increase of circulation, and the other nearly ten times as great; showing by the experience of our own country, as well as that of England, that circulation does not need to keep pace with population or wealth.

We often hear it remarked that before the war the country was flooded with State-bank notes of all kinds; yet the highest amount ever reached was in 1857, when it was $215,000,000, and even that amount caused an excessive expansion of credits which found relief in a financial crash.

I think, in view of all these and many other facts which might be brought forward, that there is no ground for the assertion made by some, that the recent monetary revulsion was caused by a lack of circulation.

Any increase that might be made to the currency, to gratify the present clamor of some, would in the long run make it no more efficient for the carrying on of business. If you add to its quantity you lessen its value. There would be an apparent increase of prices; it would take more paper promises to buy a given quantity of gold, wheat, lumber, or iron; these commodities would be worth no more, but the currency would be worth less, and it would take more currency to represent an equal quantity of them.

If a bushel of wheat be to-day worth one dollar, and to-morrow you double the volume of paper notes in circulation, the bushel of wheat will bring two dollars in such currency; but your doubled depreciated circulation does no more business than half its quantity did before.

A recent writer on political economy put this in the following lucid form:

Ten persons were at play. For greater ease they had adopted a plan of each taking ten counters, and against these they had placed a hundred francs under a candlestick, so that each counter corresponded to ten francs. After a game the winnings were adjusted, and the players drew from the candlestick as many ten francs as would represent the number of counters. Seeing this, one of them, a great arithmetician, perhaps, but an indifferent reasoner, said, "Gentlemen, experience invariably teaches me that at the end of the game I find myself a gainer in proportion to the number of my counters; have you not observed the same with regard to yourselves? Thus, what is true of me must be true of each of you, and what is true of each must be true of all. We should, therefore, all of us gain more at the end of the game if we had all more counters. Now nothing can be easier; we have only to distribute twice the number."

This was done; but when the game was finished and they came to adjust the winnings it was found that the thousand francs under the candlestick had not been miraculously multiplied according to the general expectation. They had to be divided accordingly, and the only result obtained was this: every one had doubled the number of counters, but every counter, instead of representing ten francs, only represented five.

Now those who clamor for an increase of note circulation want more counters; but each counter will, if its circulation be doubled, have but half its previous purchasing power.

It would be an easy matter to enlarge the volume of currency so that it would take ten paper dollars to buy a bushel of wheat or one gold dollar, but no sane man will contend that the farmer would be getting any more value for his wheat than he gets to-day.

The reckless issue of vast quantities of paper currency which is irredeemable will soon cause the subversion of all values, and inflict serious injury on every business interest of the country. Every new issue diminishes the value, and the demand for still further issues will continue. Of course the prices of commodities may not be affected uniformly or immediately; but it is only a matter of time.

Believing as I do that our present paper circulation is abnormal and redundant, (facts sufficiently attested by its depreciation,) and while I beg to be understood as not advocating any rapid or sudden contraction, I would not be true to my own convictions if I did not emphatically record my opinion that instead of increasing the issue of legal-tender inconvertible notes, (a measure, in my judgment, fraught with the greatest danger to the business of the country,) the true remedy for the existing state of affairs is to be found in the adoption by Congress of a fixed policy for the gradual withdrawal, at stated periods, of these notes by funding them into bonds or otherwise paying and canceling them. The extent of the reduction that may be necessary in order to make them equivalent to coin is a matter of opinion and estimate; but it is safe to say that if we were to begin at once with small monthly withdrawals during the periods of the year when currency can best be spared, we shall reach the specie point sooner and easier than most people now imagine.

It is in my judgment not so important that a long step, as that some step, however small, should be taken in the direction of restoring the currency to the coin standard; and that the country should understand that the policy thus adopted will be inflexibly followed out until the desired result is attained.

It is claimed by some that the increase of population and business will of itself soon bring us into a condition of specie payments; but this I regard as a delusion. A geological period will be insufficient to achieve this result so long as we pursue, as now, a system that effectually banishes the precious metals from among us.

So long as the Government furnishes a forced irredeemable currency there can be no stability or certainty as to its volume or its value, and the pressure now being brought to bear on Congress for further issues of depreciated paper compels me to avow myself a recent and somewhat reluctant convert to the doctrine that the sooner the Government can be wholly divorced from the business of issuing a forced paper circulation the better it will be for our country. The United States notes have effectually blocked the way to the coin standard, and still do so.

THE EVILS OF INFLATED CURRENCY.

The history of commerce shows that false theories regarding currency, whereby extraordinary issues of paper money have been imposed on confiding peoples, have produced financial convulsions which have shaken the nations to their foundations, and produced ruin and misery more wide-spread than have ever been inflicted by famine or war.

The power to issue an irredeemable paper currency has probably never been granted or assumed without sooner or later being abused. It is an old adage that a man thinks all men mortal but himself; so we are apt to think our nation will be an exception in regard to the abuses arising from an exorbitant issue of paper currency. From recent events I am led to think that our danger is greater than it should be.

I am aware that examples and illustrations drawn from the financial experiences of other countries are deemed by some to be inapplicable to us, and therefore undeserving of consideration. For myself I think it is well to utilize the dearly bought experience of others, and to those who think it does not become us to look to other countries I have to say that the laws of trade, of supply and demand, of money and of currency, are as fixed and immutable and of as universal application as are the laws of gravitation.

It may not be unprofitable to briefly notice some of the instances in the past where great evils have resulted from false ideas of the nature and work of currency.

The French government gave power to issue an inconvertible paper currency to Law's Bank in February, 1720; by the beginning of May they had issued notes of the nominal value of about $6,000,000,000, and one hundred livres in paper were worth about one in silver.

In 1790 the French government itself assumed such power, and authorized the issue of $80,000,000 of assignats based on the security of the public domains, estimated to be worth $1,500,000,000. In September of the same year further issues to the amount of $160,000,000 were authorized. France was then a perfect paradise for inflationists; the country was on the high road to prosperity; everybody was to have all the money he wanted.

Talleyrand and a few other leaders opposed those issues as certain to cause depreciation; but Mirabeau and others ridiculed the idea of their becoming depreciated; for were they not based on land, and what more secure and solid as a foundation for currency could there be than land. And besides it was not possible to set afloat more than the business wants of the nation would absorb.

Said Mirabeau:

It is vain to assimilate assignats secured on the solid basis of these domains to an ordinary paper currency possessing a forced circulation. They represent real property, the most secure of all possessions, the land on which we tread. Why is a metallic circulation solid? Because it is based on subjects of real and durable value as is the land which is directly or indirectly the source of all wealth. Paper money we are told will become superabundant; it will drive the metallic out of circulation. Of what paper do you speak? If of paper without a solid basis, undoubtedly; if of one based on the firm foundation of landed property, never. There cannot be a greater error than the terrors so generally prevalent as to the overissue of assignats. It is thus alone you will pay your debts, pay your troops, advance the revolution. Reabsorbed progressively in the purchase of the national domains, this paper money can never become redundant any more than the humidity of the atmosphere can become excessive which descends in rills, finds the river, and is at length lost in the mighty ocean.

We hear at the present time many speeches similar to Mirabeau's, and they appear very plausible, yet we all know how the stern events of the future demolished the fine rhetoric of Mirabeau. Although these assignats bore 4 per cent. interest, they had in a twelvemonth lost one-third their value. On the 11th of April, 1793, the severest penalties were decreed against any one who bought or sold assignats for any sum in specie different from their nominal value, or made any difference between a specie price and a paper price in the purchase or sale of goods. But it is folly to attempt by legislative enactments to overrule the great laws of trade. In four months the assignats had fallen to one-sixth of their nominal value; and in 1796 they had fallen to one-thousandth part of their nominal value, notwithstanding the fact that they were secured by the public lands. The ruin and misery caused by the issue of these assignats you all know. At length in July, 1796, the great paper fabric was wiped out with one stroke. Immense hoards of specie came forth from their hiding-places; the exchanges turned in favor of France, and during all the Napoleonic wars the specie standard was maintained at its full value.

The history of similar experiments in other countries, if such were needed, shows that irredeemable paper money incapable of issue in foreign countries, and redundant at home from overissue, becomes depreciated.

The paper money of the Danish government exchanged in 1813, at the rate of one dollar in silver for sixteen hundred in paper; in Austria, in 1810, a silver florin was worth thirteen in government paper.

At the beginning of the present century the Bank of England was led, to a limited extent, into the same mistake.

In 1797 there was a hue-and-cry, similar to what we hear at the present time in this country, that the circulation was not sufficient for the business wants of the community, and should be increased.

On March 16th, in the year 1797, the merchants of London held a meeting and resolved—

That it is the opinion of this meeting that the accommodation afforded to the trade of the kingdom by the Bank of England, in discount of bills and notes, has been found very inadequate to the present extended commerce of the country; that it is the opinion of this meeting that without an extension of the circulating medium of the kingdom by the discount of mercantile bills and notes, the general commerce of the country will be exposed to the most serious, immediate, and alarming evils.

Lord King and others of the ablest financiers of England showed the fallacy of this assumption of the merchants, that the amount of currency should be increased with the increased demand for discounts; the bank, however, enlarged its issues, and its paper became depreciated. The depreciation was greatest from 1809 to 1815. In 1814 and 1815 there was a great diminution of bank paper. In that period many country banks became bankrupt, or at least stopped payment, and it is estimated by the best authorities that in 1814, 1815, and 1816 the currency was contracted at least $100,000,000. This decrease of the paper currency rendered the resumption of specie payments in 1819 possible.

An expanded depreciated currency cannot be made interchangeable with the currency of other nations, and so attain that elasticity which is so much demanded.

A currency which is not larger in volume than the minimum wants of trade demand would be on a par with specie, even if it were not convertible into specie; but in that case it would not have that elasticity so necessary in the functions of a circulating medium.

INTEREST NOT REGULATED BY QUANTITY OF CURRENCY.

There is an impression in the minds of many, and I have seen it expressed in the reports of more than one public meeting, that the rate of interest depends on the quantity of currency in circulation. Nothing can be more erroneous. The rate of interest chiefly depends on the profits which can be made from the use of money. Of course there are other elements which affect the rate of interest, such as the character of the security offered; but the great controlling element which regulates the rate of interest on money is the profits which can be made from its employment.

If a man sees where he can, by the use of money, make 20 per cent., he can afford to pay 10 per cent. for its use. When many men see where they can use money to advantage, borrowers become many, and the rate of interest rises; but the quantity of currency in circulation has nothing whatever to do with the profits which resul' from the use of money. The increase of the quantity of circulation may raise the price of commodities, but can never increase the percentage of the profits of its employment.

Of course if the currency be so increased in quantity as to become almost worthless, men may lend it cheaper to get rid of it, especially if the borrower is likely to have to repay it in a more valuable currency at some future time; but in any normal condition of the circulation its quantity has nothing whatever to do with the rate of interest—at any rate in the direction to which I have alluded.

The financial history both of England and of this country would seem to show that the rate of interest is apt to be highest when the circulation is the largest. An increase of circulation tends to raise prices, and a rise in prices encourages speculation and stimulates borrowing, which tend to raise the rate of interest rather than to lower it.

Those, then, who think that an increase of currency would enable them to borrow money at lower rates are, I believe, greatly mistaken.

NO LIMIT TO THE CURRENCY THAT MAY BE SET AFLOAT

There is another opinion held in some quarters, which I believe to be erroneous, namely, that it is impossible to have an overissue of our present irredeemable currency, so long as the business of the country is ready to take it up and use it in the channels of trade; which is as much as to say that it is impossible for our banks to issue too much money so long as they find parties willing to borrow from them. The falsity of this is, I think, plain on the face of it.

Every mercantile transaction is capable of becoming the foundation of a bill of exchange; if, therefore, the issue of bank-notes is to continue as long as there is a bill offered for discount, there is not a bale of cloth, a bushel of wheat, or a chest of tea which may not, during its progress through the hands of successive dealers, be represented at every step to its full value by an issue of currency, and it would soon take a wheelbarrow-load of notes to buy a barrel of flour.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE BUGBEAR.

We are sometimes told that we cannot get our currency back to an equality with coin till the balance of trade be in our favor, and by that is meant that the custom-house reports must show an excess of exports over imports.

One would suppose that this ghost called the balance of trade, which was such a terror to our fathers a century ago, had in these latter days of light been forever put down; but it seems to trouble many timid minds yet. If there be a nation in the world which may safely be said to have made money out of its foreign trade and had a balance in its favor, that nation is England. Yet, taking the published statistics of her trade, and the balance of trade doctrine would show that she had been losing money at a fearful rate by her commerce; and the wonder is that the nation was not bankrupt long ago, or at least that her foreign trade was not long since abandoned as a losing business.

In a paper of Palgrave, communicated to the Statistical Society of London, I find the exports and imports of Britain for the last five years to have been—

Year.	Imports.	Exports.
1868	£294, 000, 000	£179, 000, 000
1869	295, 000, 000	189, 000, 000
1870	303, 000, 000	199. 000, 000
1871	329, 000, 000	222. 000, 000
1872	353, 000, 000	255. 000, 000
Total	1, 574, 000, 000	1, 044, 000, 000

From these figures it would appear that during the last five years the imports of Great Britain have exceeded her exports in the enormous sum of £500,000,000, or nearly $2,500,000,000, being more than the amount of our entire national debt.

I think this alone would show the absurdity of the balance of trade theory as it is usually applied, and be a sufficient answer to those who assert that we cannot maintain currency at par with specie till our exports exceed our imports.

The fact that the imports of Great Britain have largely exceeded her exports shows that she has been carrying on a profitable foreign trade, and that she brings more value to her shores than she sends away. When foreign commerce is profitable, the result must always be such.

If a New York merchant sends a cargo to China worth $100,000, and the ship, after the absence of a year, returns with another cargo, it must net him more than $100,000, or the merchant will make nothing. Suppose it nets him $200,000, and that he has a clear gain of $50,000, then he is so much richer and the country is so much better off; yet on the books of the custom-house that transaction is put down as making a balance of trade of $100,000 against this country. If the vessel had gone down in mid-ocean, and he had lost all his investment, the custom-house books would show an export of $100,000, with no corresponding import; and the transaction would be heralded abroad as $100,000 balance in favor of this country. Could anything be more absurd? Yet we find sensible men seriously opposing a return to a specie standard, because we are not sending more out of the country than we are drawing into it.

Of the same character with the balance of trade bugbear is that sometimes urged, to the effect that we can never return to a specie standard so long as we have so much interest to pay abroad. That objection is based on the exploded idea that we cannot pay our interest abroad in anything but specie, as if our wheat and corn, our cotton and petroleum, our pork and lumber, will not give us a credit balance in London just as readily as the gold of California. We may rest assured that gold is exported only when the nation can spare it better than anything else. We are a gold-producing country, and it is proper that we should export the productions of our gold mines, as well as the productions of our iron mines or petroleum wells. Moreover, gold is more likely to be drawn from us now than when it is used as currency, or the basis of our currency.

I might go into this branch of the subject at much greater length; but I have said all which at present it seems necessary to say.

THE BILL REPORTED FROM THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

This bill embraces several proposed amendments to the national-banking law, but its most important provision is that contained in section 2, by which certain existing restrictions on bank-note circulation are to be removed and what has been termed "free banking" authorized.

Now, "free banking" and "anti-monopoly" sound well, and as a general proposition are of themselves good things; yet measures of themselves good it may not always be wise to put in operation irrespective of time and circumstances.

Free banking might, no doubt, be safely and properly adopted if the circulating medium of the country were on a specie basis and equivalent to coin; but, in the present abnormal and exceptional situation of the finances, with a currency depreciated and irredeemable, I am compelled to regard such a measure as a dangerous experiment.

It will not surely be the part of wisdom thus to surrender all control over the volume of the currency, and to open the door for new issues of depreciated paper to an indefinite and unknown extent. It is to be hoped that no such rash experiment will be tried. Let us rather shut the door against any addition to the currency until we shall have dealt with, and brought to the true standard value, the circulation we already have.

The provisions of section 3, making it obligatory on the banks to provide for the redemption of their notes, are, I am aware, considered by the friends of free banking to be sufficient to prevent excessive issues; but from this view, entertained by a majority of my honorable colleagues on the Committee on Banking and Currency, I regret to be obliged to dissent.

We have now, or I fear are likely soon to have, say four hundred millions of United States notes, or legal-tenders, with which may be redeemed the present circulation of three hundred and fifty-four millions of bank-notes; and I hazard nothing in saying that the issues of the banks may be doubled and still the so-called system of redemdtion be, without difficulty, maintained.

It is a moderate estimate to say that on a basis of four hundred millions of United States notes nearly double that amount of bank-note circulation may be sustained and redemption be at the same time kept up.

The obligation to redeem, with such a basis, will count for little in the estimation of bankers, and if they do not largely increase their issues, should section 2 become a law, it will be for the reasons that Government bonds cannot be obtained at satisfactory prices, or that circulation has ceased to be profitable irrespective of redemption, and not on account of the requirement to redeem.

I will here call attention to the fact that there will be greater profit than heretofore in the issue of bank-notes if, hereafter, as provided in section 1 of the bill, no reserve is to be kept on circulation. It is true that I was myself in favor of dispensing with the reserve or circulation as an offset to and compensation for another and no doubt a wise provision of the bill requiring banks to keep the reserve or their other liabilities in their own vaults; but if free banking is to be authorized, I deem it to be my duty to point out that the effect of this provision will be to make circulation more of an object with bankers than it has yet been, and that they will be apt to avail themselves of the opportunity thus presented to increase their note circulation.

The present capital stock of the national banks is about five hundred millions; and their circulation, as before stated, three hundred and fifty-four millions. If section 2 becomes a law, there is no reason why the existing banks on their present capital may not issue one hundred millions additional circulation; and they will be very likely to do so if they see, as I think they will, profit in it.

If as a basis of the calculation we put Government bonds and coin at the present market price, and the use of money at 7 per cent., the net profit on circulation under this bill will be 2¾ per cent.; being about 1 per cent. more than it has hitherto been. In this calculation I make no charge for management, because the expenses properly chargeable to circulation of a bank doing, like all national banks, a general business, would be quite infinitesimal. I take into account, however, the 5 per cent. in circulation which it is proposed the banks shall lodge with the Secretary of the Treasury.

But in truth there has not been, and cannot be, any effective redemption of bank-notes in the present condition of the currency, because there is neither object nor motive to prompt it. What does this so-called redemption of bank-notes mean, and what does it amount to? It means the swapping of one kind of irredeemable paper for another kind, of no higher value; for the United States note, as a representative of value, is inferior to the bank-note, and is superior in one respect only, by the force of arbitrary law, and it amounts to nothing; for the holder of a bank-note, after he has taken the trouble to exchange it for a United States note, is no nearer coin value than he was before. It is a misnomer to call this redemption, and the operation is a farce, the performance of which the business community and the public will, as now, regard with utter indifference.

I am aware that as to the New York City banks there are certain brief periods every year when they would prefer to have bank-notes replaced by United States notes; but this is to a limited extent, and is felt nowhere out of that city, and the banks there have the remedy in their own hands if they choose to use it.

It is my confident opinion that, if section 2 becomes a law, a large addition to the bank-note circulation will take place, and that any system of redemption will be powerless to prevent it; that with whatever gravity the law may provide for going "through the motions" of so-called redemption by exchanging one piece of depreciated paper for another of no higher representative value, nothing effective or controlling on the condition of the currency will result from it. Further inflation and depreciation of the currency must necessarily ensue.

If the friends of this measure are willing to put it beyond question that no further inflation can occur if it is passed, this can easily be done by an amendment to the effect that, as fast as additional bank-notes are issued beyond the present authorized limit, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, pari passu, retire and cancel legal-tender notes until the coin standard is reached. With such an amendment the chief objections to the measure would be obviated; and I now give notice that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to section 2 of this purport.

Congress is absolutely powerless to fix the amount of circulating medium the country requires and ought to have. It is simply the right and duty of Congress to carry us back to the coin standard; and, this done, the laws of trade, to which I have before referred, will then govern with unerring accuracy the volume of the circulation both of paper and coin.

The mode of redemption proposed in section 3 is such as I feel sure cannot be sanctioned by Congress. It is neither more nor less than to make the Government the redeeming agent of the banks—a position manifestly improper for it to occupy. It was not instituted for any such purpose, and the idea of involving it in daily business transactions with nearly two thousand banks is a curious proof of the tendency of legislation in these days. I really wonder what the Government will be asked to undertake next.

Although no system of redemption would, in my opinion, prevent, in the existing situation, an increase of the bank-note circulation if free banking is authorized, yet I admit it is, or will, I hope, soon be, an important matter that all banks should be required, in a way they cannot disregard, to redeem their notes in New York; and if the law is not now sufficient for this purpose, it can easily be made so. Besides, the New York City banks have always had it in their power to enforce, as they at one time contemplated doing, bank-note redemption there, if they deem it necessary to do so.

I am aware that some delay has occurred in executing the law of 12th of January, 1870, for the more equitable distribution of the currency, by which law twenty-five millions of circulation were to be withdrawn from certain eastern banks and distributed to Western and Southern States entitled to it, and that in consequence honorable members from such States may feel under some degree of constraint to vote for this so-called free banking in order to obtain relief. To such I would say that the present Congress will no doubt remove any technical difficulty that has hitherto stood in the way of the prompt execution of the law in question, and thus place twenty-five millions of circulation within the reach of the States West and South now deficient in their apportionment. Besides, it appears by the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, dated 28th of November last, that he expected that all obstacles to the due execution of the law here referred to would be removed in three months from that time. Section 2 of this bill, therefore, is not needed as a measure of present relief to the West and South.

If the West and South have the means to establish more banks, and desire to do so, the opportunity cannot, under the existing unequal distribution of bank capital and circulation, be fairly denied them. A bank properly conducted is a convenient and useful institution; it cannot, however, make wealth prevail where poverty does now, any more than it can put money in the pockets of those who have nothing wherewith to buy it; neither can a bank localize the use of its circulation.

If all the national banks were located in a single State, it does not necessarily follow that the average circulation per capita actually in use by the people of that State would be greater, or even as great, as that in use in other States unblessed by the existence of a single bank of issue.

The proper business of a bank is to facilitate the marketing of the products of the soil; to lend aid to the manufacturer in transforming raw into manufactured material, and to the merchant in distributing the goods so manufactured. If a bank uses its loanable means for purposes other than these, its business is illegitimate, unsafe for itself, and useless to the public.

For these reasons I cannot vote for sections 2 and 3 of the bill as they stand. The remaining sections I can willingly support, particularly section 8, wherein the first step is taken toward the retirement of the notes of the Government. It is, indeed, a small step, but it is a step in the right direction; and the retirement of the United States notes therein contemplated is so gradual that I cannot see how it can work to the prejudice of any meritorious industry. By this process we shall reach a specie basis long before half of the United States notes are redeemed; and although it is too slow to prevent the inflation of which I have spoken in case section 2 becomes a law, it will, no doubt, tend to check it.

Some such action ought to have been taken long ago; for the gradual withdrawal of United States notes means a gradual return to the coin standard. No people were ever better situated for a return to the currency of the world than we have been.

Gold and silver are as much productions of our soil as are wheat and cotton. Since the war closed over six hundred millions of specie have been drawn from our mines, yet we have miserably failed to utilize this vast product. We must fail to do so no longer.

I regard the return to a specie basis as of the most vital importance to the stability and permanent prosperity of the industrial and commercial interests of our country, and any prosperity that may result from an opposite policy cannot but be of the most ephemeral kind.

In conclusion let me reassert the position which I hold on this great and important issue, which is that we should set our faces steadily and persistently toward such a reduction of our currency as will bring it to par with gold; at the same time let us not go into any hasty and rapid contraction. Let the reduction of the volume of our circulating medium be gradual, and it matters not how gradual we make it we must be prepared to find that it is far from agreeable to go through the ordeal.

The man who has been living on stimulants finds that it requires much moral courage and self-denial to return to solid food; so we must be prepared to hear a great outcry to the effect that the business of the country is being ruined; for the decline in prices, which must ensue to some extent, is likely to call out vigorous protests from many quarters.

When once our currency becomes convertible into coin, that elasticity which is now so much sought after will also be attained. Whenever our currency becomes superabundant, then will it be cheaper to export gold than anything else, and the surplus coin leaving this country will compel the reduction of the currency to its normal proportions. On the other hand when our currency is too small in quantity, we will draw coin from abroad.

During the panic through which we have just passed coin was drawn from abroad even when it could not be used as currency. If it could have been so used, relief would have been more speedily obtained.

Our currency, in its present depreciated state, proves a great drawback to the farmer and all others the price of whose productions is governed by what is exported to foreign markets. The farmer's expenses are regulated under an inflated depreciated currency, while he sells his products in the markets of the Old World where prices are regulated by a currency at par with specie.

Our present inflated currency encourages speculation and extravagance; increases the amount of credits; unduly stimulates importations, causing an adverse state of the exchanges and the exportation of coin; and has a tendency to feed a panic as well as to render it very serious when it occurs.

The currency of the United States was largest in 1837 and 1857, and the result was an over-extension of credits, the extension of credits and the inflation of the currency acting and reacting on each other till a very wide-spread and serious financial crisis brought us back to a sound basis.

As I said, it will require some self-denial and real courage for our people to face a reduction of the currency; but it is much better to meet some small discomfort at present, rather than to rush on headlong to certain and very great loss at no remote future.

It would be very agreeable to expand the currency, raise prices, and sail along in our balloon through an exhilarating atmosphere for a few years; but we would sooner or later be brought down to solid ground by a fearful collapse. Such a result is just as sure as it is that the laws of trade and the principles of political science are not to be trifled with and cannot be overborne.

Let us be guided in the solution of this question solely by what we consider will be for the ultimate, permanent, and lasting good of this nation; and not merely seek to do what will please for the time with no regard to the future consequences.

It is not more essential that the atmosphere which we breathe should be pure than it is that the life-blood of commerce should be wholesome.

I will only add further, that the views I have now presented, while they are my own earnest convictions, are also, I believe, in substance the views of a large majority of the people I have the honor to represent on this floor. And I must take leave to deny that the industrious, intelligent people of the Northwest, whether engaged in agricultural, manufacturing, or mercantile pursuits, are generally, or to any great extent, in favor of additional issues of depreciated paper.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, when Congress assembled, nearly four months ago, our country was agitated with a new experience. Never before had a panic fallen upon a people banking upon and making all its exchanges with paper money. Our industries had been in the fullness of prosperity; the earth had yielded prodigally of its bounties; our granaries were full to overflowing, and from short crops in other countries prosperous nations stood ready purchasers at high prices. The farmer, the merchant, the banker, the manufacturer, the laborer, were busy in their respective occupations. In a moment, without warning to the common observer, the crash of distrust fell upon us, suspending or crippling all our illimitable industries. A nation used to and willing to labor, stood without employment, paralyzed with that vague and indescribable dread that fills men's minds when overtaken with fright.

When Congress assembled the people everywhere looked to us for immediate relief.

The problem to be solved was one of no ordinary responsibility.

You, Mr. Speaker, placed upon the committee, specially assigned to this duty Representatives from different sections of our country, and of diverse financial views.

It is but just to the committee to say that with one accord they devoted themselves laboriously to the subject with a full appreciation of their responsibility; but without pressing unduly their own pet schemes. That we might the better apply the spirit of a representative government, we invited to our counsels eminent financial thinkers, eminent bankers and business men, from various sections of our country. With great patience and impartiality we have endeavored to weigh their diverse views and interests, seeking only a result for the common good of our country.

With these aims, and with these gathered experiences, added to the years of practical experience the committee themselves have had, we have been able to present a bill for the consideration of this House, the main features of which, I trust, will commend themselves to the approval of this body. It will be no surprise to this House nor to the country to be told that the committee were not unanimous upon all its sections. As God has made no two human faces alike, neither has He created two minds alike. In those great fields of religion, politics, and finance, the views of men seldom harmonize, but rather seem to delight in asserting a self-individuality of opinionated stubbornness.

PERSONAL ALLUSIONS.

I may be pardoned for alluding to a subject somewhat personal, in consideration of a statement having been made on this floor, that "the bank interests of members of this House would prevent impartial legislation," and the still more remarkable statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] found in the RECORD of March 8, which reads:

I have no doubt a majority of the Senate, and a large minority in the House, are personally interested in the passage of laws inimical to the interests of the masses.

And the further insinuation of a New York financial paper, (when attempting to account for our delay in legislation when the accumulating capital of the country stands idle and unwanted by enterprise, until some financial policy is determined upon by Congress)—

That Congressmen dabble in stocks, creating an influence one day for expansion, and another day for contraction, for their own advantage in speculation.

As a general belief in the truth of these insinuations would lower the dignity of legislation and tend to demoralize and weaken the confidence of our people, I feel it due to the Committee on Banking and Currency to state that nine of its eleven members have no personal interest whatever in national banks, and so far as I know, no member has bought or sold a share of stock within ten years, and in answer to inquiries from all sections of the country as to what the probable action of Congress would be on the subject of finances, my invariable reply has been that "it was one of those things no person could find out" in advance of our final action. While all men will agree that no dishonor attaches to legitimate accumulations, to the extent men are willing to assume its burdens and cares, yet if any representative of a free people, honored to guard and make his country's laws, should use this sacred position of trust to make money, he commits a hated crime, and should be characterized by honorable men as a national pickpocket, and be doomed to ignominy and perpetual exile in the penitentiary; but I am inclined to believe, in the absence of evidence of guilt, that all such insinuations are baseless as slander.

Mr. Speaker, all civilized men are, from the very nature of existence, students by experience in the economies of self-support. They are hourly practicing the laws of economical philosophy without instruction from theoretic teachers of the science.

Men everywhere are stimulated to labor and the accumulation of property and money for the independence they know it will purchase. They hold it as a symbol of their past industry, knowing that with it man carries about with him an evidence that he has been a participant in those activities of civilization, busy and breathless as the moments. The farther behind we leave the primitive ages, when men used the rude materials of wampum-beads and shells as money, the more universal is the desire to find the most convenient and reliable money to act as their servant for exchanges. It is no strange instinct in the breast of mankind; it is the instinct of self-protection; for money, like the air we breathe, is man's companion from the cradle to the grave.

UNIVERSAL INTEREST IN THE SUBJECT.

The universal interest in the action of this Congress, when dealing with the subject of banking and currency, is evidence that the people realize that every vote we cast will touch directly the personal interest of every one of our forty millions of people. It is to the magnitude and importance of the subject we trace the innumerable volunteer essays on finance thrust upon us from early morn to dewy eve by those financial tinkers more fortunate than all the rest in solving the mysteries of this branch of political economy. It is also to the magnitude and importance of the subject we trace the taxed ingenuity of legislators in framing measures of relief to lift the nation from its financial perplexity. We find, printed, and in embryo, bills for the gradual, and bills for the immediate, resumption of specie payments, bills for the immediate and bills for gradual funding of legal-tender notes, bills for the recall of national-bank notes and their substitution by legal-tender notes, bills for the conversion of both to par by their acceptance for customs dues, bills for the abolition of bank-notes and the interchangeability of legal-tenders into three sixty-five United States bonds, bills authorizing the Treasury to sell two hundred millions Government bonds in foreign markets for gold to supplant our paper currency. Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be evident to the ordinary human intellect that no financial alchemist can transmute this medley of contradictions to a garden of financial roses.

THE PEOPLE AVERSE TO FINANCIAL EXPERIMENTS.

The American people are eminently practical; they are averse to new and untried experiments. Their interests are too vast and too sacred to be launched into unknown and uncertain seas. We are working out on this continent the highest problem of civilization. God has furnished in generous prodigality all the material elements. From this, the final earth-rest in the march of empire westward, we are to gather up for our own happiness a new and broader civilization, and by example throw it back to revivify the exhausted elements of life to the furthermost nations of the East. Comprehending our mission, our people are jealous of experiments that may prove a delusion and a snare.

WAR IMPOVERISHES A NATION.

That stupendous war of Slavery against Freedom, that greatest battle of ideas of all the ages, settling forever man's right to his own labor in the triumph of democracy over aristocracy, buried in blood four years of toil and a million stalwart producers, temporarily impoverishing the nation, as all great wars have hitherto impoverished other nations; and, turning the balance of trade against us, it took away our gold. The financial results of great wars are much the same as when idleness and luxury of an entire nation mortgage it to those whose labors supply the luxuries idleness consumes. All modern wars produce this result. Some Americans profess humiliation at our long specie suspension, forgetting that the proudest and richest of nations from 1797 to 1824, a period of thirty years, stood as we stand to-day.

WAR NECESSITATES A NEW SYSTEM OF BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Absence of gold necessitated the creation of a more extended paper currency. Fortunately for the welfare of our country the inventive genius of those able financiers who managed the nation's Treasury through the war invented a system of banking, and adapted to it a currency which may truly be called one of the richest legacies of the war; for by it the people obtained a medium of exchanges so guarded for safety, that it grew at once into the entire confidence of all our people—a currency so in harmony with American character, that the long-sought desire for a nationalized paper currency was attained. Through it, under a restored Union, energy, industry, and genius, stimulated as if by inspiration, has doubled our wealth and activity in a single decade.

THE SYSTEM A SUCCESS.

It is something more than a sentiment when the humblest citizen of the Republic carries in his pocket a currency bearing the impress of nationality that is at par everywhere within our borders, and whose purchasing power is unaffected by mismanagement of bank officers whose issue it is. A bank may fail, but the currency is good all the same; it may well be called the "people's money;" but, with all the advantages of our national banking system, the time has arrived when the country demands that it can be perfected and enlarged to the necessities of our growth. It was created ten years ago, and ten years in our lives is more than the life of any one generation gone before. The experiences of last fall have taught us its defects. These our bill has sought to remedy.

EVIDENCES THAT WE NEED MORE CURRENCY.

The near approach to a panic two years ago gave evidence that the increase of our population and business required more currency. We saw it in the fact that the locking up of ten millions of our seven hundred millions of currency by unprincipled speculators created a stringency in money centers that distressed the entire commercial community. It was for this reason that I introduced into Congress, two years ago, a bill to suspend the cancellation of the 3 per cent. certificates, which served in our system of reserves the purpose of currency; but Congress was not then educated as now, by the panic, to the dangers of contraction. Apprehending the danger of too little currency to perform the legitimate exchanges of a rapidly enlarged necessity, I last year pressed free banking, but Congress was not educated then, as now, to its necessity. The panic came and brought losses untold to our people. In this bill we remove all restrictions of limit to circulation, and call it free banking; i. e., freedom for all to enter the banking business who pledge United States bonds as security for circulation and comply with all the requirements of the national banking law. Through this we overcome the objection to our present system, that "we have outgrown our currency." It has been the almost unanimous expression of those who have appeared before our committee that at certain periods of the year our currency was inadequate to perform our necessary exchanges. The associated banks of New York, and at the other financial centers, expressed it in the necessity of pooling their assets and issuing certificates, in New York alone to the amount of $23,200,000 during the panic, which, though bearing interest and within authority of law, was, in reality, as so much additional currency. I do not allude to it complainingly, because it was a necessity of the hour; and the able managers of the New York clearing-house, who first inaugurated this measure successfully in 1857, and adopted it again in September last, by it checked and destroyed the panic, and hence are deserving of public gratitude. When war drove away our silver currency, cities, towns, individuals and corporations issued fractional promises to pay "shin-plasters;" they were an indispensable necessity of trade. When Government issued its fractional currency then local issues disappeared, but under contraction from increase of population and wealth, we find that in sections of our country where banks are few, "shin-plasters" again predominate. General Spinner who has just visited the South, says, "The South is plastered all over with shin-plasters." It is proposed to introduce a bill to make these issues a penal offense, but without free banking and capital accumulation through it, I fear an attempt to deprive the people of the means of small exchanges would create a revolution. Our present experience in these local issues reflects the baneful influences of any policy depriving our entire people of ample currency. I hope the day is not far distant when silver will be used everywhere for our small exchange.

Those earnest appeals of the leading bankers and merchants of New York to the President and Secretary of the Treasury during the panic for more currency were also significant. That eminent and practical merchant, Mr. A. A. Low, of Brooklyn, New York, engaged in the China trade for more than thirty years, and whose personal interests would naturally lead him to advocate specie resumption, said, in his most interesting remarks before our committee:

Our currency meets all the requirements of the merchant and manufacturer, and I do not know what more is wanted. During all our panic no man had apprehension of the safety of national-bank notes or legal-tender. I would be in favor of free banking under certain restrictions. I think it is manifest that there has been too little rather than too much currency. Everybody carries more or less in his pocket, and in some portions of the country it is hoarded. With the growth of the country more currency will be needed. I am in favor of more currency, but it should be redeemable, if not in gold, certainly in legal-tenders. Why there should be any restrictions in this country, under proper safeguards, I do not understand. The national-bank notes are based on gold bonds, and the liabilities of stockholders added thereto give them absolute security.

And he might have added that, although the national-bank notes are not based directly upon gold, their basis (United States bonds) commands gold at par (10 per cent. above the pledge for circulation) in the markets of the world.

We have evidence from other eminent merchants in New York, men pursuing large and legitimate business, who also tell us "that it is manifest that there has been too little rather than too much currency."

ARGUMENTS AND APPEALS FOR MORE CURRENCY.

I append a letter from a careful thinker and writer on finance, whose views are in accord with my own observations. He says:

I pray you, glance at the table below. Once a year, generally in the dog-days, the reserve of the city banks is swelled to its maximum by the flow of idle country money to its center; and once a year, sometimes in October, when the western crops are being "moved," sometimes in December, when the cotton crop requires money, and sometimes in April, when the spring settlements and the opening of navigation call for currency, that reserve falls to its minimum. The following table gives in round millions the maximum and minimum of the reserve for each of the past eight years, the period during which our currency system has been fairly on trial:

Statement showing the maximum and minimum of the reserve from 1866 to 1873.

Date.	Maximum.	Date.	Minimum.
1866, September 1	$92,000,000	March 3	$58,000,000
1867, August 10	76,000,000	November 23	57,000,000
1868, August 8	74,000,000	December 26	48,000,000
1869, May 29	58,000,000	December 24	44,000,000
1870, June 4	61,000,000	December 31	45,000,000
1871, August 9	73,000,000	December 30	40,000,000
1872, June 15	55,000,000	April 13	36,000,000
1873, August 2	50,000,000	October —	5,000,000

You perceive that in these eight years the maximum reserve had fallen from ninety-two to fifty millions, and the minimum from fifty-eight to five millions. The minimum of 1866 was eight millions in excess of the maximum of 1873. In other words, the amount of money drawn from bank and hoarded by individuals had increased steadily year by year until, in 1873, the reserve was exhausted.

The effect of the gradual withdrawal of money from the banks to individual hoards was faithfully reflected by the money market. In December, 1871, when the reserve first fell to fifty millions, money became worth from 90 to 100 per cent. per annum—a rate which no legitimate business could pay and live. In the following autumn the reserves fell to forty-one millions in October, and to thirty-six millions in the subsequent April; and in consequence there never was a day during these seven months when money was not worth over 7 per cent., and there were weeks together when it commanded from 25 to 50 per cent., rates which no merchant can pay without ruin. This winter the rate of interest would have been even higher, but that, on the 20th of September, 1873, the reserve fell to the unprecedented figure of $31,000,000; and this, occurring at a period when conspicuous failures had created a general distrust, led naturally to a general run on the banks. On the 20th of September the banks lost twelve millions out of their slender reserve, and though they nominally suspended payments on the next business day, they lost during the three weeks following fourteen millions more—reducing their greenback reserve, about the middle of October, to the pitiful sum of about $5,000,000. At this period there was no money market. It was simply impossible to sell paper or borrow on call. The crash was the result.

If, as I believe, these are the facts of the case, it follows—

First. That the panic and the bank suspension were due to the steadily increasing amount of money withdrawn from bank—where it was used in facilitating commercial exchanges—to individual hoards, where it lay dead.

Secondly. That the amount of money liable to be so withdrawn increases in the ratio of the development of the country, and the acquisition of wealth by persons residing far from the great cities, and indisposed—from want of financial knowledge—to trust their money out of their own possession.

And from these two the corollary would seem to follow that a general panic and bank suspension must occur hereafter at least once a year, unless—

1. The individuals who have been for the past eight years withdrawing money from the banks and hoarding it can be so educated as to abandon the practice hereafter; or,

2. They be deprived of the means of withdrawing money from the bank by a general crop failure; or,

3. The volume of the currency be periodically increased so as to fill the vacuum created by rural hoarding.

How long it would take to so far educate the thousands of Germans, Norwegians, &c., who grow wheat and corn in the Northwest, and the thousands of negroes, mulattoes, and ignorant whites, who raise cotton in the South, in the laws of political economy, that they should understand the grave injury they inflict on the community at large when they hoard the money they receive for their produce, you can judge better than I. If it cannot be done, and at once, and the crops do not fail, perhaps you will point out how an annual panic can be averted without an increase of the currency in some shape or other.

The following memorial was read in the Senate March 17 by Senator LOGAN, "signed," he says, "by two hundred business men in New York"—I presume all borrowers and not lenders of money, as the memorial came unheralded by that high-sounding authority of "$460,000,000 representation:"

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners beg leave respectfully to represent that they are greatly alarmed at the efforts being made by money-lenders to induce your honorable body to put a stop to the further issue of legal-tenders by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to compel him to increase the bonded indebtedness of the Government, in order to cancel and destroy the too limited and only currency on which the whole people draw interest; thus increasing taxation for the benefit of the foreign bondholder, while reducing the means and ability to pay.

The rapid and immense increase of the industry, resources, and wealth of the country, under the beneficent influence of this safe currency, in which all have confidence and interest, demands its increase rather than destruction. The experience of the last few years, especially in the fall, when the agricultural products of the year must be marketed, has demonstrated that there is insufficient currency to do the legitimate business of the country. Hence there has been increasing stringency in the market, causing great distress and alarm, by which money-lenders have been able to profit for weeks and months, to the extent of ½ to ¾ of one per cent. per day, and in extreme cases even as high as 2 per cent. per day, or from 45 to 700 per cent. per annum, and this in the money center of the continent. This has enabled a few men at such times, by locking up money, to aggravate the difficulty, and thus command their own terms, not a few of whom are now asking your honorable body to contract the currency that they may more effectually ply their infamous traffic.

These causes produced the late disastrous and ruinous panic, which will undoubtedly be reproduced with still more prostrating effects unless relief be afforded.

Your petitioners therefore respectfully ask that the volume of the currency be increased, especially the legal-tenders, and that provision of elasticity be made, so that business may again be safely resumed.

Mr. Ward, of Michigan, who for years has done so much to develop the great West, and who for many years has given employment to thousands in lumbering, mining, and manufacturing, said to our committee that the rates of money, and the difficulty of procuring it, upon the very best of security, had constantly increased since our policy of contraction began, until within the last two years the business of the West was crippled and almost paralyzed. He adds:

It is not probable that many members of Congress can fully appreciate the sad and desolate condition of most of our manufacturing communities, and no one can, unless he is placed in a position to realize from his own experience the difficulties that surround the managers of these great and beneficent establishments, many of them with thousands of able-bodied men, with their dependent families, and the managers utterly unable to procure the means for their monthly pay; and if they could possibly run their mills or factories for a time, the country is so depressed that there is no safe market for their products. Put yourselves in their place, and remember these are the men who are to protect and perpetuate this Government, and that their children are to be the future voters as well as workers of this nation. Treat them as human beings; give them work and pay; and they will bear with patience all the other ills of life, and bless the land that gives them liberty and plenty. Starve and degrade them, and the curses of broken faith and base ingratitude will haunt the authors of their wrongs to their everlasting homes.

The urgency with which I make this appeal is prompted by the fact that nearly four thousand idle men, and ten thousand of their dependents, to a great extent rely upon my simple efforts to supply the necessary means to pay for the maintenance and labor necessary for their support.

The testimony of all men from the South and West was of like import, except those representatives of trade unions, who confessed that they were "middle-men," brokers between the producer and the foreign consumer, making all their settlements in gold, they occasionally lose and occasionally make money in the fluctuations of the gold market. Hence they and the importers have argued for resumption. Selfishness dictates the argument. In the height of the panic I was in New York, and the metallic-currency bankers thought then was the opportune moment for resumption. They seemed to have forgotten that they had been banking upon a basis of $356,000,000, equal in all its relations to business and finance to gold, because they could with it pay their debts; and yet at a moment when they were nominally broken, as if to show that bullionists are always wiser and more solid in argument than other men, they proposed to accept as a panacea for all their woes a basis of $135,000,000,* in place of $356,000,000, for all their banking operations, because it was gold. This was reversing the rule of three, and could work successfully in no other place in this world outside of Wall street; and to add to the impressiveness of the metallic argument, we were told that our "depreciated," "irredeemable," "dishonored" paper currency was the cause of overtrading and the wild speculations resulting disastrously in a financial crisis. They forgot that they themselves, by paying interest on deposits and by the natural laws of trade, held centralized within their own vaults, (and as positively within the control of the bank officers of New York as if they owned it,) all those vast millions, which if they did not loan there could be no "wild speculation" resulting in financial crises.

Calm men outside that sea of speculation willn aturally ask, what guarantee has the country that when we reach specie resumption they will not, all the same, lend this centralized money, and with it will all the same bring about those "wild speculations" resulting in financial crises, as in 1857, when it came upon a gold basis?

But there is a class of American citizens who did not come before the Banking and Currency Committee, that vast army of hard-fisted, large-hearted laborers of our country, who are the real sufferers from contraction—I will further along consult that tell-tale of a nation's realities, the census report, and let it speak for them—every one of whom finds use for and handles more currency in a year than any one of those memorialists "representing $460,000,000," whose petition for resumption my colleague from New York [Mr. POTTER] presented with so much modesty a few days since. Merchants, importers, and bankers, in large cities, settle every transaction with bank-checks, even the payment of market-bills, pew-rent, carriage-hire, and clothing. I have myself transacted many millions of business in a single year, and never saw in twelve months as much actual currency as a farmer in my country finds it necessary to use in the same time. Men whose business is with foreign countries will memorialize for resumption because the law of selfishness governs mankind.

FORCED RESUMPTION.

But resumption with the balance of trade so much against us as it is now is an impossibility, unless all experience and history are false. We might resume for a day or a week, but we should fail in every attempt, as England failed, in repeated disaster, when forcing resumption over the unchangeable laws of trade.

*$135,000,000 estimated gold now in the United States.

We find in the North British Daily Mail opinions of our currency system expressed by Hon. George Anderson, a member of Parliament. It reads:

If America attempt to resume specie payments we may rely upon seeing within a few years as complete a break-down as followed our own adoption of that policy after 1819 up to 1825. If America is rich enough to adopt such a policy now without most serious difficulty, one thing is quite clear, there can have been no good ground for a financial crisis. To take a severe financial crisis as the fittest opportunity for resuming specie payments looks like insanity. It may, however, have another interpretation. The crisis may be solely the artificial result of an international scarcening of the currency in order to bring it equal with gold with a view to resume. Currency reformers on this side would view such retrogression with regret. America in her currency had made such a forward stride that it might have been expected she would have found out the real error in her system, and perfected it, instead of going back. That one error is its being rigidly inelastic.

We might legislate immediate resumption, but the result—inevitable—of another panic would make the experiment too expensive a luxury even for the metallic-currency mind.

Pennsylvania banks suspended September 10, 1839. The Pennsylvania Legislature, by law of April 3, 1840, required the Pennsylvania banks to resume on the 1st day of December, 1840, under penalty of forfeiture of charter. The banks resumed, but suspended again February 6, 1841. Commercial requirements overrode legislative commands. From 1817 to 1824 three attempts were made at resumption by the Bank of England, and three failures ensued with wide-spread bankruptcy attending each.

It is my solemn judgment, determined after years of study of the attempts of legislation by nations and States to override the unchangeable laws of trade, that we might as reasonably look for the millennium of man's honesty through congressional enactment "that all men should be honest," as to, by statutory enactment, resume specie payment successfully and permanently before the conditions of trade should prepare the way. We can legislate in that direction, and this we propose to do, because without it we stand in unnatural relations to the trade of the world, which recognizes gold as the representative of values between nations.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF GOLD.

I append a table, prepared by Mr. Young, of the Bureau of Statistics, full of interest to the student of our economies. It shows our imports and exports from 1821 to the present time, including coin and bullion. This, however, gives no exhibit of the Government, State, and municipal bonds sent abroad during the past ten years, representing $1,500,000,000, upon which we pay gold interest amounting to $100,000,000 per annum. It will be evident to reflecting minds analyzing this table that our loss of gold arises from our too prodigal importations. This table tells of our excess of importations over exports, from 1831 to 1840, of $210,334,149; from 1841 to 1850, $7,223,504; from 1850 to 1860, $37,731,773; from 1860 to 1870, $317,409,390—an excess of imports in forty years amounting to $572,698,816; and that our exports of gold and merchandise for 1871, 1872, and 1873 exceeded our imports $172,740,883. Our imports of gold, from 1850 to 1873 amounted to $316,132,996, and our export of foreign coin and bullion for the same time amounted to $160,543,847. We exported of domestic coin and bullion, from 1850 to 1873, $1,247,360,067. We have taken from our mines of gold and silver, since 1850, $60,000,000 per annum, but it is estimated that our people resident in Europe and traveling in foreign lands spend there about the same amount annually that we take from our mines. (See table on page 3541.)

The genius and energy of our countrymen in inventions and manufactures are now competing successfully in many of the markets of the world; but we cannot reasonably expect to overcome the balance of trade if we cripple these industries through contraction. If we import more than we export, we must pay the balance in something; if not in our products, then it must be in gold, or in our Government, State, and municipal bonds. Let us not by a mistaken financial policy prolong the desired result of resumption, but rather by a liberal and safe policy restore it.

FREE BANKING.

The spirit of our institutions is antagonistic to monopolies; the spirit of liberality is antagonistic to special corporate advantages; hence the almost universal demand for free banking. This, too, is the spirit of trade throughout the world.

When the joint-stock banks of England discovered a clause in the law whereby they could issue currency, the managers of the Bank of England, who had so long enjoyed the monopoly of circulation, applied to Parliament for more restrictive legislation to prevent the issues from joint-stock banks but a majority of Parliament, more than thirty years ago, said to the Bank of England, "The day of monopolies is past." If there are men in this House who from their interest in national banks would hesitate to aid us in removing the monopoly, I say to them in all kindness, beware, for the spirit of freedom abroad in our land will not long tolerate any system whereby a portion of our people are deprived of its advantages; and their persistence in sustaining the monopoly will at no distant day cause the people to sweep this best of all banking systems from off our statute-books.

ELASTICITY.

One of the chief merits of gold as a medium of exchanges between nations is its quality of elasticity. If we were banking upon a gold basis, and needed more currency to move the crops, it would flow in from other countries, because we could afford to pay for it by the gain its immediate use would afford, just as it now flows, when needed, from one European country to another.

Our present fixed amount of currency does not possess this elastic quality, and never can, without the amendment we propose in this bill for practical redemptions. Fortunately in our two paper currencies there exists a power to create this elastic quality, and we have applied it. Accepting the necessity of elasticity of currency from the fact that the great earth products of our land ripen and must be forwarded to market in a short period of time, and that through free banking we can obtain currency enough for its greatest necessity, and that in periods of rest, after the crops are moved, the surplus of currency afloat on the country would tend to stimulate unhealthy speculation, we, by the machinery of redemptions where it accumulates in our large centers, take it up and send it back to the vaults of the banks, there to remain until the legitimate commerce of the country again warrants its issue. We here obtain the desired elasticity in our currency.

REDEMPTION.

We propose to remove the reserve on circulation—which is amply secured without it—and to create a fund in the United States Treasury by a deposit equal to 5 per cent. of circulation, to be always kept full and specially held by the Treasury to redeem bank-notes when presented for redemption.

The defects in our banking system made more apparent by the experiences of last fall's panic have suggested a necessity for some radical change to withdraw from the great moneyed centers of our country those vast periodical accumulations which by use in speculation hazard general prosperity.

It has been said that if the accumulations of currency in New York were burdensome, the banks themselves would create a clearing-house for redemptions; but we know from sad experience that three such attempts have failed, notwithstanding a periodical plethora which causes national-bank notes to sell at a discount of from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. below legal-tender notes. It has been urged that our proposed measure would prove a burden upon our banks; but as an offset to all such objections we propose to relieve the banks of the still heavier burden attending present redemptions of mutilated notes.

Many of our banks have hitherto employed an agent in Washington to count and destroy their mutilated notes. We find a practice has grown up of each bank depositing a few thousand dollars, without interest, with an agent here and elsewhere, as a compensation for the labor attending the destruction of their mutilated notes and replacement with new.

The failure of the First National Bank of Washington reveals such deposits from five hundred and forty-five banks, amounting to $872,440.61, "wholly on account of mutilated currency;" and from sixty-three other banks, "for mutilated currency and other business," $143,973.27. A calculation of interest upon average deposits with this bank, say $900,000, at the rate money commands in the District, (10 per cent.,) and we find that one-third of the national banks of this country have been in this way subjected to an annual tax equal to $90,000, and a possible loss from the failure of the bank performing these redemptions of $250,000 more. This unnecessary burden upon our banking system we entirely overcome by redemption through the Treasury, where all mutilated notes go now, and must always finally go.

The assorting and replacement of new notes in place of the worn and mutilated, which will so much add to the safety and respectability of our currency, can be done in our Treasury with more rapidity and at less cost than elsewhere, for we have the machinery now in operation and competent female experts employed at moderate salaries, ready and competent from long experience. About $35,000,000 of mutilated national-bank notes are now annually replaced with new, and yet much of our currency is in a condition not altogether creditable to our civilization. This proposed method will place in the hands of the people new notes and prevent large accumulations in New York.

RESERVES TO BE KEPT AT HOME.

We propose, as another measure to prevent an undue accumulation of money in New York and consequent speculations inducing panics, that the reserves of our banks required upon deposits shall be kept in the vaults of the banks where the deposits are made. This measure needs no comment, as it is universally approved.

TREASURY DEPOSITS OF RESERVES.

The law we passed in the last Congress, allowing banks to deposit in the United States Treasury their reserves, to be held as a special deposit, and for which the Treasury issued certificates of deposit payable on demand, proved to be a measure of great advantage and safety to the country banks, many of whose vaults were insecure against modern burglars. The amount so deposited before the panic exceeded $30,000,000. When the panic came the banks in our large centers found that the people had drawn away all their legal-tenders and bank-notes. Hence they could not respond to the calls of country-bank depositors, and much distress was brought upon country banks whose deposits were in the New York banks; but all those country banks holding Treasury certificates drew their legal-tenders from the Treasury, and were able, without embarrassment, to accommodate their home customers. In many places in New York State where the banks were so fortified business went on as usual, and the people knew nothing of the panic beyond what they saw in the newspapers. So apparent was this advantage that these deposits in the

In estimating the population for the decade from 1860 to 1870, an equal distribution of increase has been assumed, while for the war years (1862 to 1865 inclusive) about three-fourths of the population are supposed to share in the consumption. This gives 1861, 32,154,826; 1862, 32,866,331, (24,649,749;) 1863, 33,577,836, (25.183.377;) 1864, 34,289,341, (25.717,005;) 1865, 35,000,846, (26,250,635;) 1866, 35,712,351; 1867, 36,423,856; 1868, 37,135,361; 1869, 37,846,866.

Treasury have increased since the panic to over $50,000,000. Statutory requirements (without doing away with these certificates) for banks to keep their reserves at home will work in this direction a much-needed reform. The section of our bill for stamping on each note the charter number of the bank is simply to facilitate their assorting.

GOLD NOTES AND CANCELLATION OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

The last section of our bill, providing for the retiring of two million legal-tender notes each month for Treasury notes, payable in gold two years after date, and the hoarding of gold to pay them at maturity, is open to such objections that I cannot approve of it. First, no nation ought to have more than two currencies. The hoarding of forty-eight millions of gold by the Treasury, with the present small amount of gold in the country, would of itself place the gold market entirely in the hands of merciless speculators, and the premium would pass beyond the control of the natural laws of trade, and would inevitably reach a price beyond what would be for the interests of the country.

As national banks increase under free banking, the legal-tender basis will be reduced by the requirements of reserves as rapidly as the trade of the country will bear. Under our laws, banks can only redeem their issues with legal-tenders or gold. Every new bank established reduces the outstanding legal-tenders in the legal necessity existing for reserves, and this process must inevitably bring us to specie payments in time.

Experience through many years proves that banks require no statutory laws to force them to keep on hand ready for any emergency reserves equal to about 20 per cent. in the country and 30 per cent. in the cities. There is a higher law, the law of self-preservation, which instinctively forces adequate reserves; and, if all arbitrary laws requiring reserves were abolished, I doubt if the amount held by banks would be decreased. From the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency we find that country banks, required by law to keep 15 per cent. reserve, held in 1868 an average of 22½ per cent.; for the years 1869 to 1872 an average of 21 per cent.; and in the redemption cities for the three years, 1868 to 1870, the average reserves exceeded 30 per cent.; for the year 1871, 29 per cent.; and for the year 1872 over 27 per cent.

We are told that free banking will put upon the country a circulation of 90 per cent. of our entire bond indebtedness, or about sixteen hundred millions of currency. Such men forget that under our national banking laws our banks must redeem their issues in legal-tender notes or gold, and that, when the outstanding legal-tenders are locked up as reserves, the banks can only redeem in gold. The national-bank deposits exceed the amount of circulation. Upon our present $356,000,000 circulation and deposits our banks lock up $150,000,000 legal-tenders as reserves. It will, therefore, become evident to every mind that we cannot reach a circulation of $800,000,000 without having reached specie payments. We shall, through free banking, approach resumption steadily and gradually, without shock to the natural business of the country, but as rapidly as our present condition will justify. This is the true road; any other is dangerous and impracticable.

BANK PROFITS.

An almost universal misapprehension exists in the public mind in regard to the profits of banking under the national banking act. Members of this House have repeatedly asserted that it is the most profitable business transacted in this country. This false impression sways their minds to-day in prejudice against our almost perfected national banking system. I regard it of vital importance to remove this misapprehension, because it is an instinct of all men to war against any business that gathers to itself an undue proportion of profits from the industries of our country. At the close of the war the nation found itself in debt more than $2,700,000,000, as a compensation for a change of the then existing State banks to the present system; and that the Government might place at rest, in the form of bonds, a portion of its indebtedness, many inducements and opportunities for profit were offered to banks that do not exist to-day, and from which large profits were accumulated during many years.

I trust that the desire of legislators to treat this subject with entire candor will induce them to examine the following returns of the net earnings and dividends of all our national banks, returned under oath of the bank officers to the Comptroller of the Currency, as required by the act of March 3, 1869, and then to contrast it with the appended table, showing the profits of banks in England, where capital is more abundant and the ways of its employment less than in our own comparatively new country. A careful study of these tables will dispel the erroneous impression so universal in the public mind.

The Comptroller says:

The national banks were required by the act of March 3, 1869, to make returns to this office of their dividends and earnings semi-annually. From these returns the following table has been compiled, exhibiting the aggregate capital and surplus, total dividends and total earnings of the national banks, with the ratio of dividends to capital, dividends to capital and surplus, and earnings to capital and surplus for each half-year, commencing March 1, 1869, and ending September 1, 1873:

†Public and other deposits September 11, 1873.

The statistics of the Bank of England and its dividends were obtained from the report of the Bank of England published in the Economist for September 13, 1873. The usual dividends of this bank are 10 per cent. per annum, but the amount has varied for some years past from 8 to 13 per cent.

From these tables we glean the fact that the national banks of our country have earned for their stockholders, from 1869 to 1873, an average of less than 10 per cent. upon capital invested, and this through years of comparative prosperity, while the banks of England were able to earn and pay their stockholders an average of more than 15 per cent. Nor should we lose sight of the perilous nature of the banking business, because experience has shown that a single panic has swept away in a single day the profits of years, and sometimes annihilating capital and profits together.

Mr. ARCHER. I will ask the gentleman if the agricultural interest has yielded one-half that percentage to the owners of the soil?

Mr. MERRIAM. I think it would have yielded more had we not restricted the currency limit so low that agriculturists could not have all the advantages they ought to have had.

Mr. ARCHER. As the gentleman challenged the democrats on this side of the House to listen to him, I would say that the gentlemen on that side, having had control of the currency, have depressed the agricultural interest and built up bankers with these large percentages.

Mr. MERRIAM. We have done some things in regard to the currency that we should not have done. We have restricted the amount too long. We are going to correct it, and make you all happy.

I am aware that it is impossible for men easily to understand how national-bank profits can be so small, when they only see the one fact, that Government pays 5 per cent. interest upon bonds held by banks for a basis of circulation, and when it at the same time supplies the banks with currency which can be loaned at a higher rate of interest, which is so generally believed and expressed as "getting double interest upon capital." Let us examine the peculiar machinery of our banking law, adjusted with so much wisdom to perfect security to the public, and we ascertain why the profits are no larger than capital can earn and does earn in other branches of business.

First, we will consider the establishment of a bank in Illinois, where capital commands 10 per cent. interest. To establish a bank with $100,000 capital we buy of Government bonds, at 110, $100,000 5 per cent. gold interest-bearing bonds; when these are deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency he furnishes $90,000 circulation. The law requires an average reserve held idle in the banks of $18,000, say 20 per cent., which deducted from the $90,000 leaves $72,000 to loan at 10 per cent.

Therefore the result from the establishment of a national bank in Illinois will be—

Ten per cent. on $72,000 circulation	$7,200
Five per cent. gold interest on bonds	5,000
Premium on gold interest, say	500
Deduct 1 per cent. national tax on circulation	900
Leaving a balance of	11,800

or $800 more than the same amount of cash ($110,000) would command any day if invested in that most perfect of all securities, a bond and mortgage upon real estate.

The higher the rate of interest in any locality the less the profits upon bank-note circulation, because of the loss of the difference of interest upon the amount taken from the capital by the necessity of an idle reserve; but this same necessity applies to any mode of banking, from the fact that with or without arbitrary laws self-preservation dictates to modern bankers the holding of a reserve fully equal to the amount required under the national banking act.

Permit me to bring the same test to New York, where the legal rate of interest is 7 per cent.

With the same cash, $110,000, we buy $100,000 of bonds. Upon this $100,000 we receive $90,000 circulation; deducting from which 20 per cent., ($18,000,) the average amount of idle money held as reserve, we have $72,000. Loaning this at 7 per cent. leaves a result of $5,040; 5 per cent. interest (gold) on Government bonds, $5,000; 10 per cent. premium on gold interest, $500; making a total of $10,540. Deduct national tax on circulation, $900, and the income from the $110,000 will be $9,640. We could receive at 7 per cent. on the $110,000, if loaned on bond and mortgage, $7,700; the difference between which and the $9,640 shows an excess of profit from banking in New York of $1,940, in Illinois of $800 more than the income would be from a bond and mortgage investment. Three per cent. difference as loss by reason of high rate of interest in the West between $110,000 and $72,000, or 3 per cent. on $38,000, gives $1,140 as the excess of New York banking profits over Illinois.

This exhibit would not of itself attract capital to free banking so rapidly as to "flood the land with irredeemable paper money." The great bugbear of inflation from free banking, under the restrictions of our national banking system, can become a reality only in the imaginations of men who have not carefully made this analysis.

The advantages and profit from banking under our national system come from the confidence its security inspires in the minds of the people, and which induces them to deposit with national banks everywhere their floating capital, and from which, mainly, banks derive their profits.

THE WEST AND SOUTH FEEL THE NECESSITY FOR ADDITIONAL BANK FACILITIES.

The West and South see the necessity and advantage of more local bank facilities. Hitherto the great West and South have been content to invest their surplus accumulations in enterprises promising greater returns than is possible from banking, and have been forced, in the absence of adequate local banking facilities, to borrow at high rates and great disadvantage in the East.

The advantages of banks in any busy community are seldom fully appreciated. They gather together, increasingly, more and more, year by year, the loose earnings of the people, and distribute them to the development of home enterprise, from which the people themselves find increased employment and happiness. Banking is the only mode of bringing cheap capital to labor; it always has proved a gentle fertilizing power in the great social workshop, and when conducted with safety to the bill-holder and depositor, it becomes one of the greatest of economic blessings to mankind. Free banking will be the great opportunity for the South and the West. In 1860, the South and Southwestern States had a bank circulation, issued under State laws, of $71,098,408. Under the national banking system the same States have now less than $40,000,000. New England had before the war a circulation of $65,576,155, now it has $110,489,960; and her representatives assert that she has none too much. New England has a circulation per capita of $31.68; the Middle States, $12.82; the West, $7.09; the South and Southwest, $2.91.

THE WEST AND SOUTH LONG AGO APPLIED FOR THEIR PROPORTION OF CIRCULATION.

These great undertakings required for the successful prosecution of the war turned western capital into other channels than banking. The stimulus to enterprise then aroused has intensified ever since, only in other undertakings, all promising greater rewards than banking; but as the accumulations from labor increased the West applied for the privilege of establishing more banks, only to find themselves shut out by the absorption to the legal limit of $356,000,000 by older and richer States.

Free banking will be her opportunity; the panic of last fall has unloosed millions of capital hitherto employed in those vast enterprises which have pushed the West to greater progress than any other people hitherto have reached in the same period of time. Her enterprises were carried forward under the disadvantages of dear money borrowed from the East. Give her free banking as she demands, and the thralldom of the West will be severed from the Shylocks of the East. The marvel is how, with money at 1 to 1½ per cent. per month, she ever grew to such proportions. It shows the power of strong hands and vigorous minds working in generous soils.

NECESSITY OF HOME BANKS TO RETAIN CIRCULATION.

It has been argued that it was economy for the West to borrow of the East at exorbitant rates of interest rather than to take her capital from paying enterprises to establish banks; but borrowing from the East implies a continued inadequacy of currency in the West from the necessity of redeeming note obligations in currency, at the place where it was borrowed, at maturity of every discounted note, except in the season of moving the crops, when the crops themselves will pay the notes.

Loans from banks located in the West, paid every sixty or ninety days, enforce the continuance at home of what the West most needs, an adequate amount of currency issues.

A realizing sense of the heavy tax upon labor from dear money, added to the vexatious difficulties and delays in obtaining loans in a market ever distrustful of distant undertakings, has, beyond question, aroused the great workers of the South and West to appeal to Congress for relief through free banking.

OUR CURRENCY.

Advocates of a metallic currency assert that no dollar of currency can have value that has not cost a dollar to produce—hence, that our paper currency is "depreciated, worthless, and dangerous." Some men claiming to be American citizens characterize it as "dishonored trash." The "promises to pay" of a people having no habitation, honor, or virtue—mere wanderers in deserts or on mountains, without intelligence or the accumulations of industry—might with some degree of propriety be characterized as "dishonored trash;" but to say of a great, free, and vigorous nation like ours that its promises to pay are "worthless trash," is neither evidence of patriotism, financial acumen, or common sense. Chief Justice Chase, who was Secretary of the Treasury when the acts of February and July, 1862, and March 3, 1863, were passed authorizing the legal-tender issue, said in the case of the Banks vs. The Supervisors, (7 Wallace, 26,) that these acts contemplated a permanent circulation until resumption of payment in coin of $400,000,000, and, in 7 Wallace, 29, that the period of payment was left to be determined by public exigencies. In the act of 1869 Congress declared that the United States also "pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of United States notes in coin."

With the balance of trade against us, as I have shown, and the fifteen hundred million indebtedness abroad requiring an annual payment of $100,000,000 interest in gold, it is evident that the "practicable period" has not yet arrived, and hence that our "promises to pay" are not, never have been, and I say unhesitatingly never will be, "dishonored." We pay our interest at home and abroad in gold. Our own currency we owe to ourselves. The American people require it for permanent circulation, and it will be so used long after gold mingles in and dollar equals dollar.

Mr. Speaker, there are men on this floor whose promise to pay will command gold in the note-markets of our country, because back of it stand long years of integrity, industry, and accumulation. So of the promises to pay of a nation, standing proud, free, and honored before the world. But we are told it is worthless because it costs nothing to make; that it is the mere creature of the printing-press. The same sophistry might be applied to the individual promise to pay; the paper costs nothing; but it binds houses and household goods, farms and cattle, all accumulations, past and future.

The labor of a few thousand men brings forth gold from our mines, but our promises to pay bear the impress of the labor of forty million people. It is this labor, that only producer of wealth, that stamps its credit and gives it the power of money within our own borders. Men who are afraid of our paper money forget our great past and have no conception of America's future.

There is not gold enough in the world to transact the business of modern commerce; hence, each nation invents its own paper currency. Nations not deprived of gold by exhaustion from war, pestilence, or famine, base such paper currency upon gold that it may float at par with the prices of the commodities of the world. In the absence of gold, our paper is based upon our nation's faith, and we shall bring it to par with gold when by stimulated industry we lift the mortgage upon our industries now held by other nations. I have no words adequate to express my admiration of the ingenuity of our paper system, which, when perfected by this bill, will measure and supply at all times all and no more currency than will be required by our vast commerce to compass the aims of our people to a grander civilization and progress than ever before.

Mr. George S. Coe, president of the New York Clearing-House, a banker of life-long experience—and I only express what is universally conceded when saying that he is one of the most able financial thinkers of our age—said to our committee that—

> If you adopt Mr. MERRIAM'S plan of redemptions, and allow the two systems of free banking and redemptions to go out together, the volume of currency will regulate itself; and while the crops are being moved it will expand, and afterward it will return again to the banks which issued it; for as you make redemptions practical you make bank-notes a more perfect representation of property. Free banking and practical redemption will result in supplying the amount required for the trade and commerce of the country when wanted.

It cannot be charged as an unjust interference with private rights, for, as Mr. Coe wisely remarks—

> When Government gives to banks this living power, it should enforce such provisions as the public require for safety.

The Commercial and Financial Chronicle and Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, of December 13, says, when commenting upon this bill:

> "All legislation should be based on a popular want," says a modern jurist, and the first question about a new law is, what is the real want it aims to meet? Applying this test to the new bill which is proposed to secure elasticity of the currency, we find, on the whole, a satisfactory response.
> This new measure will be presented in the House by Mr. CLINTON L. MERRIAM, who is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The bill provides—
> First. That the present legal limit restricting the aggregate of the bank currency shall cease.
> Secondly. It enacts that a prompt redemption of the bank-note shall be secured by establishing an assorting-house at Washington, with a branch in New York. By this new mechanism the bank-notes are to be daily sent home for redemption to the banks issuing them, and at the expense of these banks.
> Thirdly. The Government is to redeem all bank-notes through this assorting-house; and to provide funds for this redemption, each bank must place in the Treasury a reserve of greenbacks equal to 5 per cent. of the aggregate of its outstanding notes. This 5 per cent. of its reserve must be kept good by the banks at all times.
> Fourthly. The banks on these conditions are to be relieved from the obligation to keep 15 or 25 per cent. of reserve on their circulation, but the reserve on their deposits must be maintained as at present.
> Such, in substance, is the proposed bill, which is, as will be seen, of a very novel character. The want it aims to meet is the notorious and urgent want of elasticity in the circulating medium. To confer this quality the banks are to be compelled to redeem their notes. This it is supposed will contract the outstanding aggregate of notes in the summer by the amount of fifty or sixty millions at least. These notes will go home for redemption. It will be impossible to keep them out. During the whole of the dull season, if the assorting machinery is efficient, the bank currency will be kept down to the normal amount wanted for the business of the country. At other seasons, when business is more brisk, the assorting-house will not get the notes for redemption. These notes will consequently stay out and will keep up the current of the circulation to its normal level. This new machinery of the assorting-house is so simple, and its purpose is so well understood, that we need spend no further time in describing either its functions or its necessity. Its operation is like that of the great dikes in certain parts of Holland. When the flood rises above the safe level and threatens trouble, it is seized and disposed of by powerful machinery. When it sinks below the point of danger, the mechanism is mute; and room is left for the natural streams which supply it to raise the current to the proper level of safety.

The New York Bulletin and the New York Financier, whose views are respected in financial circles, also editorially approve of the main features of this bill.

I hope it is not unparliamentary to quote the following from a speech delivered in another branch of Congress by an eminent Senator, February 27 last. I may be pardoned, because it has been quoted everywhere by the press as an embodiment of the metallic-currency sentiment of the country, and has been scattered broadly for reading by us all. In it are many mild though cleverly applied sophistries, deduced from experience when wandering hand in hand with that Venetian traveler, Marco Polo, to the home of an ancient tyrant who chose the novel mode of taxing the people through a compulsory acceptance of worthless paper promises, but he forgot to take from the great store-house of history those other innumerable methods of oppression resorted to through the ages to rob the people—"forgot," perhaps, because he could make no practical comparison between the power of a tyrant over ignorant masses, and the paper promises of a great, free nation themselves creating a paper promise, redeemable through taxation upon wealth and industry immeasurable, and whose application to our necessities has been tried through years—tried, though not "tried and exploded again."

We can forgive the logic of men so learned in Chinese experiences, but who, neglectful of modern history, overlook the experiences of the present which other men read in the statistics of the rewards of labor in our own country as compared with the rewards of the pauperized laborers of England, though he exclaims:

> Let us in this light compare England with the United States. In England, as well as in all European countries, the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is far greater in proportion than in the United States, and every one who is acquainted with those countries knows it. There are large armies there, large navies, which we have not. The number of private servants is much larger than here. The number of operatives and daily laborers is still greater. Now, although the population of the United Kingdom is only thirty-two millions, while ours is forty millions, yet the number of persons receiving salaries and wages is not only in proportion, but absolutely greater, much greater in England than here; and although wages rule higher here than they do there, yet I think I do not venture much when I say that the aggregate amount paid in wages and salaries in England is much larger than it is in the United States.

It is fearful to contemplate the exodus of American freemen from happy homes all over our land, especially from Missouri, after this advertisement that English servants and idle soldiers receive greater rewards than they. Still we can forgive many sophistries in those who arrive at one practical utterance like the following, where the graceful debater says:

> Now, sir, I do not wish to be understood as being absolutely opposed to free banking under any circumstances. I should be inclined to vote for it if it be coupled with an effectual system of redemption.

And when speaking of our currency, he admits that—

> A restraining influence, however, might be imparted to it even while we are under suspension of specie payments, by establishing between the Government legal-tender and the national-bank note the same relation which in suspension times existed in England between the Bank of England note and the country-bank note there; that is to say, if we give the Government legal-tender note a sphere of action superior to that of the national-bank note. This might be done by repealing that part of the national-bank act which provides that the national-bank currency shall be a legal tender in payment of taxes and other dues to the Government; and the system of redemption might be made effectual by establishing assorting-houses at the different business centers of the country. That, I think, would increase the demand for greenbacks in contradistinction to national-bank notes. It would make the conversion of national-bank notes into greenbacks an object of desire in the ordinary run of business, and it would oblige the issue of national-bank notes, if they are to remain at par with greenbacks, to stay within the limits prescribed by the possibility of actual redemption, made effectual by the establishment of assorting-houses. I throw this out as a suggestion to be considered by Senators.

LABOR, NOT GOLD, PRODUCES WEALTH AND HAPPINESS.

Never before in the history of the world has there been such an opportunity to test by experience the ability of a people to advance to happiness and wealth with no other medium of exchanges beyond paper "promises to pay." Fortunately, in our intelligence and necessity, we have escaped all those terrible catastrophes prostrating Spanish grandeur, so eloquently described by Macleod in his Principles of Economical Philosophy. He says:

> Spaniards were dazzled with the brilliant prospect of securing the greatest part of the wealth of the world without labor, imagining that the well-being of the country consisted in amassing enormous heaps of gold and silver, mistaking the means to the end, and not discerning that the precious metals are only precious so long as they are used for setting industry in motion—the tilling of land, the mother of increase, or the building of ships to promote the commerce of nations, or plying the loom to produce clothing for mankind.
> While the precious metals poured into the country in boundless quantities, which the statesmen of Spain thought would make them the rulers of the world, it began immediately to decline; its industry was paralyzed, and the most sanguinary penalties were unable to prevent their much-coveted treasures flying from the country, till at last it was reduced to the lowest depth of poverty, weakness dishonesty, and contempt. Next to Poland, Spain became the weakest and poorest nation of Europe. Scarcely ever has the world seen a country blessed with so many resources by nature so suddenly descend from so lofty an eminence to such a pitch of degradation.

We find that other than Spanish sovereigns believed that their chief power consisted in the accumulation of the precious metals. It became a cardinal point of their policy to import gold and prevent its export. From about the beginning of the fourteenth century the laws of nearly every country in Europe endeavored—but always in vain—to prevent its export. Statesmen and merchants alike were infected with this delusion; and this same delusion lives to-day and crops out all about us in the fallacious proposition to sell two hundred millions of our bonds to foreign nations for gold, which we could not retain six months against the inexorable laws of trade.

The experience of England, during her long suspension of specie payments, does not so well illustrate the results from the use of paper money as ours, though her progress in wealth through many years of her suspension was marvelous, because of her repeated drawbacks from premature attempts at resumption. Neither can the progress of Russia and other European powers, under a suspension of specie payments, illustrate as ours the capabilities for advancement during specie suspension, because political liberality, especially the freeing of serfs, became a powerful element in stimulating labor and the consequent increase of wealth.

It is only when an entire people marshal a paper servant to perform its internal exchanges, as ours has done for ten years past, that we can measure practical accomplishments attainable through its use, and then only by an inventory of the results. This inventory can be read of all men. He who ten years ago traversed this vast continent from ocean to ocean, from the great lakes of the North to the Gulf, and traverses it to-day, marvels at the almost magic upbuilding of cities, towns, villages, and happy homes, rich in all those modern aids to civilization and human happiness the inventive genius and activity of our people have created in places where ten years ago there were no cultivated farms, no schools, no churches, no railroads, no busy industries, no happy homes; but a waste as solemn and silent as a thousand years ago.

Here we are to-day with our old cities doubled; our new ones glowing with life; our millions of then unbroken acres teeming with life and yielding immeasurable bounties and blessings. The young life of our race, buoyant with hope, elastic with promise, is wrestling with the arts, the sciences, and with every promise of splendid rewards.

Bury in the ocean all the gold of the world, and these triumphs of labor and genius remain all the same. Theorists may in vain deride our "depreciated, irredeemable trash," but the great fact of increase stands before us to-day, and asserts that labor, and not the servant of exchanges, is wealth.

OUR PROGRESS WITH ONLY PAPER MEDIUM OF EXCHANGES.

No man can gainsay that, in no period of human history in one decade, has the willing laborer compassed so many blessings for himself and his family. In no other ten years has there been given such constant and well-paid employment, through which the humblest mechanics, who practiced ordinary economy, have so educated their children, been so well dressed and well fed, and bought and paid for so many homes, as through the period when we have had none other than "depreciated, irredeemable trash," and in the use of which I have never yet heard an honest toiler complain that it was so "worthless" that he was not willing to give his labor to obtain it. Witness the savings of the laborers of our country. We find that the savings-banks of New York and New England hold to-day more capital, representing their accumulated industries, than all the capital of all the two thousand national banks in our land.* It represents more wealth that could be converted into money than all the tyrants of old ever saw.

Turn a moment to the results of accumulations of the new-born freemen of the South, as illustrated through the beneficent influences of the Freedmen's Savings-Bank. They were taught by its managers the blessings of saving the rewards of their labor, and we find that $50,000,000 have come in, little by little, until each depositor had saved enough to buy a little home of his own, and forty-seven millions have gone out into fixed capital into land and cabins at present owned by the late slave, until all along the rivers and on the uplands of the South men and women, under God's blue sky and our country's stars and stripes, (stripes more redolent of joy than those of old,) are progressing to a better manhood, and in the new-born love of the soil, now their own, becoming useful citizens of our Republic. All this was accomplished from the sweat of honest brows even while using our "irredeemable, depreciated trash." Surely great blessings have followed, considering the disadvantages of the presence of so bad a currency.

Bury all the gold in the world, and these homes remain a living monument of patient industry. I am told that men have lived extravagantly and beyond their income, and that some have built beyond their means, because of the influence of paper money; but men in all ages have done this, and for all time will enter into profitless enterprises and reap disaster; and therefore that is no argument for others being kept idle. Railroads, those great civilizers and now indispensable instruments of material progress, have been pushed, it is true, too far into the next century for the happiness of some men, and yet that great accomplishment of modern times, the Pacific road, binds together the continent, making two republics an impossibility. It is a marvelous monument of the imbecility of men who use paper money.

In a recent legislative discussion on this floor, when in the heated wrestle for mastery through that high-school art of classical debate, my keen-witted friend from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] disclaiming forever his vast possessions, assumed the attitude of injured innocence, exiled from his hard-earned many millions, he stood before us a confessed and sorrowing pauper, and he said "paper money had done it." I confess for a moment I forgot the indiscretions of youth, and sorrowed with him over the betrayal of youthful confidence. The prairies of his opponent had wooed his last dime, still he said "paper money had done it." The great army of workers all over our land had grown rich and happy under the stimulus of our paper money, while he alone stood wretched and comfortless before us, and said "paper money had done it." I could but picture "what might have been" in his hard-earned money prudently saved in the Freedmen's Bank, uprearing for himself and little ones a cabin on the Suwanee River, and his soft voice exclaiming to us in the joy of a new-gained happiness, "and paper money did it."

CREDIT.

We now use for carrying the products of industry from the producer to the consumer United States notes, national-bank notes, and bank-checks. In our large centers 96½ per cent. of all exchanges are made with checks, and the farther removed from large cities, where banks are numerous, the greater the necessity for the use of United States and bank-notes. Checks and bills of exchange are instruments of personal credit, and from their very nature are less secure than currency fortified by the seal of Government. Just in proportion as bank-notes and legal-tenders are inadequate to perform the vast exchanges of the country is the necessity for the use of the less valuable promises to pay; but the magnitude as well as the convenience of commerce demands the use of checks and bills of exchange. Of gold there is not enough in the world to make the exchanges of modern commerce; hence credit becomes the most gigantic species of property in all commercial countries.

Says Daniel Webster:

Credit is the vital air of the system of modern commerce. It has done more, a thousand times, to enrich nations than all the mines of all the world. It has excited labor, stimulated manufactures, pushed commerce over every sea, and brought every nation, every kingdom, and every small tribe among the races of men to be known to all the rest; it has raised armies, equipped navies, and triumphing over the gross power of mere numbers, it has established national superiority on the foundation of intelligence, wealth, and well-directed industry.

So also an able French writer, M. Gustave du Puynode, says:

However fruitful have been the mines of Mexico and Peru, in which, for a long time after Columbus, seemed buried the fortune of the world, there is yet a discovery more precious for humanity, and which has already produced more wealth than that of America: that is the discovery of credit; a world altogether imaginary, but vast as space, as inexhaustible as the resources of the mind.

But, Mr. Speaker, credit unbridled has all along the ages wrought disaster and misery. Fortunately for the people of this day, private capital is sensitive, and experience has devised a system of banking which only needs the appliances we propose in this bill to give stability and safety to all our internal commerce; but credit in some form, either in bank-notes, checks, or bills of exchange equal to our necessities, is indispensable to progress. Had the bankers last fall, in our large centers, when pooling their assets as a buttress against disaster from a raging panic, instead of only attempting self-protection through credit contraction, but followed the example of the Bank of England in similar crises, extended credit to perfectly solvent customers, they would have checked disaster and panic together. Twenty-five millions thus loaned would have served the same purpose as the twenty-five millions of currency they besought the President to loan them, which he wisely declined, because, as he said, "the President cannot violate law."

If bankers only extend credits to merchants in times of abundant money, they become commercial traps to lure the merchant to extend his business under a fair sky, only to be wrecked in cloudy weather; for panics come so suddenly that commercial communities are wholly unprepared for them. The crises of 1857 and 1873 were more disastrous because not generally expected. We are aware that in England, in 1857, the ruin that followed was, as here, a stupendous loss to the country; that while the amount required to meet mercantile liabilities was vast, as it always is in England and America, yet the amount required for temporary relief was comparatively small; that what was most required was the credit which prudent loans would have readily supplied. Says that English author of the Blue Book and the History of the Bank of England, when describing the crisis of 1857 in London:

The great American firm of Peabody & Co. was known to be on the point of suspending, though perfectly solvent; but, like so many other firms kept out of their money, were unable to meet their engagements. The help required was £800,000 sterling, and the act prevented the Bank of England from advancing this sum. No sooner was the act suspended, and the bank unfettered, than it advanced the $4,000,000, and Peabody & Co. were saved.

Saved for those great charities that so honor our humanity. He adds:

The beneficial effects produced by the suspension of the act, and the resolution to extend its issues, were instantaneous. In four days after the suspension of the act, the panic had ceased throughout the kingdom. Many firms suspending for want of speedy relief resumed and paid in full, and they would have been saved enormous losses if monetary relief had been extended to them by an earlier suspension of the act. There is something whimsical in the fact that the question of bankruptcy to solvent firms should be dependent upon a change in the law of the land between half-past two and half-past three o'clock of one day, but that was the simple fact which saved Peabody & Co. between those afternoon hours on the 12th of November, 1857.

The senior partner of Peabody & Co. was held by the Bank of England to be so wealthy as to furnish of his own name sufficient security for the enormous amount of four millions of money, but other firms equally solvent "failed before the act was suspended."

LIBERAL FINANCIAL LEGISLATION LAST CONGRESS WOULD HAVE PREVENTED THE PANIC.

To thoughtful minds will come the suggestion that all the financial disasters of our country to-day could have been obviated had Congress a year ago, when it was so obvious that contraction threatened our industries, passed the bill now matured for its consideration. It is through credit alone that the young energy of American youth, born in poverty, but alive to work, finds entrance to those profitable fields of enterprise that make us rich by developing the hidden resources of our country. Whenever a country is overtaken by a financial crisis disasters fall not upon the rich lenders of money, but upon the workers, whose energies and accumulations are pledged to capital. Hence it is the highest duty of legislators to study the influences that work upon the minds of men to produce financial crises, and to so legislate as to obviate them. Panics furnish a harvest for the rich in the low forced sales of property. Large capitalists at such times only are able to buy. All legislation in the direction of financial stability is in the direction of protection to the many; the few who are rich can always protect themselves.

* National-bank deposits average $625,000,000; national-bank discounts average $950,000,000; national-bank capital $491,000,000.

Legislators and students in the science of political economics can read in our own experiences the baneful results of inadequate currency to perform all the business of the country. In 1857, when the country was banking upon a specie basis, the balance of trade against us drew away our gold, and our banks suspended. It happened just at the season when the great cotton crop of the South was going forward to the markets of Europe at an average price of fifteen cents a pound. The bankers unwisely refused loans to customers, and those merchants who held cotton for advances made to the producers, unable to borrow, failed, and England, who stood ready to take our cotton at fifteen cents a pound, bought it under forced sales at from seven to nine cents a pound, and our nation, from want of a stable financial system, lost at least $50,000,000; and the people of our country were thereby made fifty millions poorer.

CONTRACTION THE CAUSE OF THE PANIC.

In 1873 we had a currency panic, from the contraction of our currency. From the 31st of August, 1865, when it was at its maximum, and stood on the books of the Treasury at $1,152,914,892.67, including legal-tender bank-notes, 3 per cent. certificates, and compound-interest notes, and when mercantile business was most healthy from its thirty-day credits, and when the ordinary small transactions between man and man, including paying of labor promptly, were made with cash, down to the fall of 1873, when our currency, including legal-tenders, three hundred and fifty-six millions; bank-notes, three hundred and forty-nine millions; and fractional currency, forty-eight millions, had been contracted to seven hundred and fifty-three millions, less one hundred and twenty-five millions held idle in the banks as reserves, and the estimated loss of fractional and other currency through the war as burned, destroyed, or lost on sea and land, of twenty-five millions, added to the estimated amount always in transitu over our great country in express and by other carriage, ten millions, and the money held by the collectors of the State, county, and municipal tax, amounting annually to nine hundred millions, at ten millions, and we have—

Available as actual circulation		$753,000,000
Less reserve	$125,000,000
Loss by land and sea	25,000,000
Hoarded	100,000,000
In transitu	10,000,000
Held for collected taxes	10,000,000
		270,000,000
An actual contraction to		483,000,000

In 1860 we had—

Bank notes	249,000,000
Coined gold and silver	250,000,000

Mint estimate, $300,000,000; Treasury estimate, $275,000,000.

To this actual contraction from funding compound-interest notes must be added the comparative contraction from the increase of population and wealth. In 1860 our population was thirty-one millions; in 1873, forty millions. In 1860 our wealth was $16,000,000,000; in 1873, $31,000,000,000. In 1860 our circulation was $499,000,000; in 1873, $483,000,000—$16,000,000 less than in 1860—with four millions of colored people now for the first time finding use for money. Add these four millions to our nine millions of actual increase of population, and we have thirteen millions more human beings to-day using money than we had in 1860. Can it be enough for all our diversified industries? It seems to me that any school-boy can tell the ablest teacher of political economy that forty millions of people, of like habits and industry, require more money to make the trade exchanges of the country than thirty-one millions of the same people.

AMOUNT OF OUR CURRENCY CONTRASTED WITH THAT OF OTHER NATIONS.

Let us contrast with our own available currency that used by other civilized nations; for something can be learned by contrast. The total amount of gold coin used as a circulating medium in the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland January 1, 1873, was £84,551,000; bronze, £1,148,000; silver, £15,000,000; and the excess of bank-notes over coin reserves £40,540,000 sterling—a total circulation of £141,239,000; being equivalent in United States gold coin to $686,421,540. And let us not forget that this old and financially conservative nation has but thirty-two million souls; that hers is an old and comparatively completed country, with no new enterprises, and with so small a territory, that her financial necessities can be compassed by railroads and the telegraph in twenty-four hours; while the United States, with her forty million people, all on fire with enterprise, extends over a territory three thousand miles wide, and over twenty parallels of latitude.

Then take France, with a population and wealth perhaps equaling but not exceeding ours, and she, too, an old completed country. France had, December 26, 1873, of currency, 4,000,000,000 francs, and paper notes of the Bank of France in circulation 2,807,689,625 francs—a total of 6,807,689,625 francs; from which deduct the metallic reserve in bank, 759,962,419 francs, and the currency circulation is 6,047,727,206, equivalent, in United States gold coin, at twenty cents to the franc, to $1,209,554,441.

Let every thoughtful, patriotic mind carefully analyze these statistics, for these rich old conservative nations have had experience.

HOARDING.

I may be asked upon what I base the $100,000,000 in my estimate as hoarded, and I answer that last spring, after Congress adjourned, I went through the South with a view of ascertaining how much currency was hoarded by the colored people; I went into cabins and by-ways. I talked with intelligent colored teachers and preachers, with the rich and the lowly, and I am convinced that fifty millions, hid away in cabins in safe places and buried in the ground, is a low estimate; for we must remember that the South has produced every year since the war from three to four million bales of cotton, netting over $200,000,000 per annum, which has brought cash, and the colored man did all the work. We must remember that these people had seldom seen gold; that the greenback was the first thing they ever earned they could call their own, the first thing, save our flag, that stood before them a symbol of their freedom. With it they soon learned a power to gather together long-broken families into a common happy home. To the colored men the greenback rose above the dignity of a language; to them it almost bore the dignity of religion. This precious-earned companion of the new freemen they gather and cherish as better than gold, the possession and power of which they never knew.

To my mind there is no mystery in their hoarding fifty millions of "greenbacks." It is no large estimate to say that fifty millions are hoarded by the whites of our country. It is an instinct of humanity to "lay away something for a rainy day." Away from thickly settled communities and savings-banks men hide it in safe places. It is the same instinct that led the millionaire and the humble to take all the currency from our banks last fall and hoard it as an anchor of safety until the storm of panic was past.

The history of all time teaches us that just in proportion as men have confidence in money they hoard it. During the reign of wild-cat money in the West the honest farmers were so often victimized forty to sixty cents on a dollar on all the bank-bills they held that they naturally became distrustful of all paper currency, and for years never brought their produce to market until ready to exchange for commodities required for family use. To-day these same farmers take advantage of the highest market prices, accepting our currency with a confidence that assures us they know it is the debt of a nation too proud and too great ever to repudiate; that it is the first mortgage upon all the property of a nation that will not always be in debt, and which has reduced the national mortgage from its maximum, August 31, 1865, $2,757,689,571.43, to $2,157,470,114.41 on the 1st of February, 1874, an average yearly payment for more than eight years of seventy-seven millions.

MISCHIEVOUS AND UNFAIR COMPARISON.

It is sad to contemplate how many able and ordinarily fair-minded men seek to unfairly and dishonestly deride our currency, telling us to beware. They compare it to the assignats of France based upon the confiscated unproductive lands of the clergy, which being unproductive possessed none of those economic attributes of life and warmth which justify confidence in the holder that they will ever be paid. They point to the assignats and tell us to beware. They compare it to the paper money of our Revolution, which, owing to our then imperfect arts, was so counterfeited by enemies and rogues as to render it impossible to distinguish the genuine from the counterfeit; they point to it and tell us to beware.

They compare it to the late confederate currency, based upon a triumph of aristocratic ideas over the generosity of a civilization reaching ever forward to greater liberty of thought and action, and which, with God's blessing, will never turn backward to blight the pathway of humanity. They point to confederate paper and tell us to beware.

They compare it with the paper promises to pay of that beggarly remnant of Spanish power on the shores of the western continent, and say, "Behold the Cuban currency," and cry "Beware!"

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. LAWSON in the chair.) The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. FORT. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MERRIAM. They tell us of the "South Sea bubble," where the cupidity of our usually stable cousins was excited by systematic fraud in which government and the people went mad and lost their senses and virtue in the vain hope of acquiring unearned riches from beyond the seas without toil, and tell us our paper currency will inflate and burst like the old bubble. But was it paper money that seated this dishonor upon the brow of English statesmen and English character, or was it that gambling propensity which poisons alike all mankind who are deluded by the fiction that riches can be obtained without honest toil? Is it in sincerity and honesty that intelligent men point us to the "South Sea bubble" and tell us to beware, when the great power of our currency is based upon a necessity for its use and in the mutual confidence of honorable men, without which there is no possibility of extended commerce, which is one of the master glories of civilization?

ASSERTED LOSSES TO THE PRODUCER FROM PAPER CURRENCY.

There is another fallacy and a cheat attempted to be practiced upon the farmers of our country, and which was effectually exploded in a speech by the late Secretary of the Treasury. They charge in one sweeping assertion that farmers can never grow rich while they sell their products of cotton, pork, cheese, and corn in foreign countries for gold, and pay for what they buy in gold and currency.

It is so obvious a deceit that it is scarcely deserving of contradiction. The farmers of our country possess more intelligence than many theorists. They can read, write, and cipher, and always use common sense. A farmer in my district produces cheese worth $10,000. He sells it for a price it commands in foreign markets in gold, less commissions and transportation. Suppose he dispensed with all middlemen and took it himself to England, receiving his pay in gold; suppose he consumes of foreign goods $1,000; he sells for gold and buys with gold. He suffers no loss. The $9,000 he brings home, and in turning it into currency gets the premium on his gold. The farmer sees no loss, for there is none. So we could extend the illustration to all the great products of cotton, grain, &c., that are paid for in gold.

PAPER CURRENCY DOES NOT INFLATE UNLESS BURDENSOME.

In connection with this fallacy bullionists tell us that paper money inflates. So it would if it were so abundant as to become depreciated or burdensome to the people. In the days of the assignats property rose to fabulous prices, because people preferred it to other property having real value, and that could be exchanged for something else they might want, and which they could not get with worthless assignats; but has it ever been so with our currency? Its trying day was in the panic of last September. Did men throw it away then for anything else they could get, or was it the only one thing they clutched and held?

Prices, it is true, are higher for many things (all those things not cheapened in production by the inventive arts) than they were in 1848, when all the civilized nations in the world held only $3,000,000,000 of gold. Since that day from the mines of California and Australia we have dug and thrown upon the world $2,000,000,000, lessening the purchasing power of gold two-fifths, and increasing the price of land and labor to the same ratio. All men have seen from 1848 to the present hour a gradual but certain increase in prices, not only in this country, but throughout the world.

GOLD THE GREAT INFLATOR.

Gold has been the great inflationist, and unless we can shut up our mines, pouring a hundred millions annually into the lap of mankind, it will continue the great inflator; and as hateful as has been the word "expansion," it will continue the great expansionist; but even then our intelligence will enable us to use it as the measure of values throughout the world, unless some other Michel Chevalier, alarmed at its increase, writes a book telling mankind that its abundance will demonetize gold, and it falls, as it did after his last book, to a discount of 3 per cent. below silver; for we all remember that this theorist's ideas so put up the price of silver that the bankers and merchants of Europe sold their gold at ninety-seven cents on the dollar to obtain silver with which to pay the Asiatic races for the luxuries Europe had imported.

We have almost ceased to import railroad iron, and under the natural laws of trade the balance is beginning to turn in our favor; gold ought not now command a premium of over 5 per cent., and would not but for the gold-room in New York and the incessant cries of the Chevaliers of our day constantly decrying our currency.

Mr. Speaker, your committee do not propose inflation; we have carefully guarded against it by presenting to the country a self-adjusting machine to regulate a supply at all times commensurate with the growing demands of our commerce, and men who read statistics will not be frightened if we have more banks and more paper money.

Let us glance at the tide of human increase among the nations and draw a lesson of what our necessities must soon be.

In 1854 and 1872 the population of the leading nations stood as follows:

Countries.	1854.	1872.
Great Britain	27, 620, 000	32, 000, 000
France	35, 750, 000	36, 100, 000
Germany	33, 500, 000	39, 400, 000
Austria	36, 500, 000	35, 900, 000
Russia (in Europe)	65, 000, 000	71, 000, 000
United States	27, 000, 000	40, 000, 000

Contraction will not prepare the way. The tide of empire flows in upon us! Intelligence of the masses keeps pace with our material progress. The post-office is a tell-tale. The postal revenues returned in 1860 were $9,218,067; in 1873, $22,996,747. The number of post-offices in 1860 were 28,498; in 1873, 32,244. Steamboats, railroads, and horses now carry our mails 256,210 miles, and reach all our people; and the nation's most enduring wealth keeps pace with our intelligence.

THE FARMING INTEREST.

The value of farms, farming implements, and machinery in the United States, as reported in the census returns, were as follows:

Year.	Farms.	Implements and machinery.
1850	$3, 271, 575, 426	$151, 587, 638
1870	9, 262, 803, 861	336, 878, 429

The total product of farms in 1870 was $2,447,538,658. No man can blind the farmer by whatever plausible sophistries he may conjure up, for he has as good eyes to see, and he sees every day with as clear a vision, as theoretic writers on finance. He has intellect, and he uses it. He has common sense, and he knows that to handle all the increased productions of an increasing population, all the tools and machinery required by modern husbandry in economizing labor, requires a proportionate increase of money. His very children know that it requires more money to handle much property than to handle a little.

I have many letters daily, from all over our country, asking us to legislate at once and set our industries in motion again, and in every instance urging free banking. I will give you but one letter; I received it but yesterday. It speaks for a mighty class of intelligent workers in our land; and although the writer is a stranger to me, I am proud that his home is in the district I have the honor to represent. There is more philosophy in his few words than was ever dreamed of in the schools. I proudly place this letter side by side with the utterances of many men in high places, those professed teachers of the science of economical philosophy. The farmer is the master teacher:

EAST RODMAN, JEFFERSON COUNTY, NEW YORK,

DEAR SIR: Permit me to thank you for your article on the currency in the Watertown Reformer of March 12. We Farmers are glad to find our Representative on our side of this question. Although we have but little to say in this matter, we think much. We know that the indebtedness, both public and private, of this country was contracted when gold was high. The contractionists now wish to make us pay in gold, thereby paying more than we received. The money-lenders and those having a fixed income are the only classes benefited by contraction. As a large manufactory requires a large stream of water to set in motion all its spindles and looms, so this country requires no contracted stream of currency to set business in motion. We of the producing (and debtor) class want to pay every debt we owe. But we must have currency to pay with, or our business stops and we are bankrupt.

Please excuse this trespass on your time and patience, as it is not meant to be an effort to instruct you, but to inform you that the "common people" will "back you" in your efforts to assist them.

Very truly, yours,

O. D. HILL.

Hon. C. L. MERRIAM.

The farmer, in an intelligent liberality, applies the same rule of relative necessity to all the activities of all our people that he applies to his own experience. He sees that a great and industrious people have been crippled in their progress by statutory limit to our currency, when no legislation can limit the growth of his crops or the increase of the human family. He wants cheap money; and knowing that the price of money, like other property, is governed by demand and supply, he looks with suspicion upon those $460,000,000 memorialists of Wall street petitioning Congress for further contraction, thereby raising the price of money by decreasing its quantity. There are good men's names on that petition; unselfish, generous men. And as many are practical business men, I marvel all the more. Yet, absorbed in their own business of vast magnitude, having no time to study our census returns, the country has outgrown their knowledge.

THE RESPONSIBILITY UPON THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

But the mission of the republican party is not to serve the interests of the few, but the many. The millionaires of the country, from their cushioned parlors and glowing fires, can, through the press and a million pamphlets, thick upon our desks as the leaves of the forest, read to us their version of political economy and advertise their varied panaceas for the ills we bear; while, silent and suffering, that great army of labor, with fires extinguished and hunger not afar off, plead to the party in power to set in motion again the now silent wheels of industry. The people hold in their hearts a precious memory for the great work it has done in the past; they will hold aloft the flag of the republican party so long as their representatives are pure and true to the interests of the masses. We must sweep away the Sanborns and burn the barnacles of selfishness that steal a festering presence to blister our fair fame. The republican party must rise to an appreciation of the financial necessities of to-day, and heeding the calls of our toiling millions, fearlessly lift the nation again to activity and prosperity. Now is our opportunity, and the nation holds us to the responsibility.

Perhaps I weary the House with statistics, but in no other way can a single eye pierce the activities of our land.

The total number of manufacturing establishments in the United States and Territories, in 1860, producing the value of $500 and upward, was	140, 433

The amount of wheat produced in 1860, was 173,104,924 bushels; in 1870, 287,745,626 bushels. The amount of Indian corn in 1860, 838,792,742 bushels; in 1870 it was less—but that was an exceptional year, and should not be taken as a fair showing—it was 760,945,559 bushels; in 1872 it was 1,100,000,000 bushels.

The exports of Indian corn, rye, wheat, &c., in bushels, in 1860, was 8,800,000; in 1870, 39,000,000; and in 1871, 45,000,000. Flour not included.

HAS THE WEST CAPITAL TO ESTABLISH BANKS?

We are told that the great West—that future empire of the world—

pleads for more currency, but cannot take it if permitted through free banking; that currency cannot be given away by the nation; that they must first by industry earn wealth, and then they can establish banks and get currency. Let us turn to seven States of the West, and contrast their past and present wealth with seven Eastern States, and then judge of their ability to establish banks.

Increase population, 854,669. Increase farm valuation, $539,386,902.

To this exhibit I beg to call the special attention of my colleague on the committee from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who rises into sublime and eloquent disgust at the very mention of a greenback except when generously forgeting his antipathies over the asking of us to oil the wheels of his pet centennial with a few millions of them. His State has no such antipathies. She holds tight her $18,000,000. Illinois in one decade has added to her population 290,486 more than all the population of Connecticut; she has increased in ten years 827,940, and Connecticut has only 537,454. Missouri, too, has gained in ten years more population than Connecticut has to-day. I hope Connecticut's loyal sons will hold fast her anchorage; drifting toward the prairies she could be lost in a single corn-field; and yet she holds on to this detestable paper currency and will not yield a dollar to the West.

WE MUST ACCEPT THE SITUATION.

Intelligent, fair minds of our country will pause before this marvelous exhibit of the tide of empire, and discover at a glance the justice of the demands of our energetic countrymen of the West for the removal of these bank restrictions that shut them out from banking and currency facilities commensurate with their progress. Here we have seven Western States with 4,169,145 more population than seven Eastern States, and having $92,170,041 less bank circulation. Surely, if we regard the rights of all our citizens our duty is plain.

We also compare the valuation of real and personal estate of six Western States with six New England States.

States.	1860.	1870.
WESTERN STATES.

Increase in 6 New England States in last decade		2,176,026,485

We also find that six Eastern States have an excess of circulation upon apportionment on population and wealth of $70,690,046; five Middle States $9,416,503, while fourteen Southern and Southwestern States have a deficiency of circulation on like apportionment of $51,271,034, and nine Western States a deficiency of $21,423,811.

Figures like these are more eloquent than words.

The secret of the rapid accumulation of wealth, the progress in civilization, the triumphs of genius, the marvelous advances in human happiness of the men of our day and country, is to be found in the one fact that no other race has so grappled with the common, every-day realities of life, and measured the necessities of all the people by the experiences of individual life.

OUR PANIC AROSE FROM INADEQUATE PAPER MONEY AND NOT FROM WANT OF GOLD.

The panic of last fall—not unlooked for by many—came to blight our progress like a pestilence. Men in their fright rushed, not for gold, but for our paper promise to pay. Does any student of the schools of economics venture to tell us that if our vast growth had not absorbed our medium for exchange that willing labor would to-day stand idle on the streets? We can recover from the disasters of a mistaken financial policy through the operations of this bill, the main provisions of which are free banking, practical redemption, and the retention of reserves at home.

STAGNATION IN BUSINESS WHEN MONEY IS UNUSED.

Men point us to the fact that in all our large money centers money is accumulating in large quantities, and do so as an evidence that there is in the country currency enough, and much to spare.

This is true of to-day, and always is true after a panic, when the business of the country is in comparative liquidation, caused by a suspension of business. Every man knows that when the industries stand still, there is no use for money; but the nation would become impoverished and its revenues would shrink us to bankruptcy were they so to remain. We cannot safely longer delay putting them in motion, and when in motion again, "as they were before the panic," to use the language of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] "there will not be money enough in the country to transact its business any more than there has been at times the last few years; hence the necessity of free banking to avoid another panic."

INTERCONVERTIBLE BONDS.

I find there is in the minds of some members of this House a deep-seated impression that it would be wise to destroy our present national banking system, and make the United States Treasury in reality a bank through which the whole country could get interest upon idle capital, and receive when wanted United States notes, United States notes only; for this policy proposes the destruction of bank-notes.

I have said that the American people are averse to any radical changes in our financial system, which they have tried, and to launch out into unknown and dangerous seas. We owe a large debt; and it is a maxim of history, the danger of changing front in the heat of battle.

The American people pride themselves upon the maintenance of their pledged faith. The people of this country were solicited in times of their country's peril to put $400,000,000 of their money into national banks. Charters for twenty years were granted by a solemn act of Congress. Banks, those beneficent institutions of society, carrying idle capital to industry, are organized and at work. It is proposed to break the nation's faith and take away their charters.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MERRIAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I believe that in 1869 I was the first to propose in an elaborate speech in this House the three sixty-five bonds. I did not propose, and do not now propose, that they shall break down or disturb the banks, except as their convenience and use as a better medium of circulation shall disturb any other business. I do not propose, and I do not know that anybody who believes with me proposes, to disturb the banking system.

Mr. MERRIAM. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he is not recognized on this floor by many of us who have been in the habit of talking over this matter, as the leader of the three sixty-five policy, though he was the originator of it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who is the recognized leader, proposes to break up the banks.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, if it applies to him I do not care. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIAM. More, it proposes a machinery whereby the Government shall become custodians of the idle money of the land; more, to pay in the form of interest, for the privilege of keeping it; more, it creates the best machinery possible for man to invent for speculators to lock up the currency of the country, and any day bring panic and financial disaster. Congress has made it a crime to use a bank for this purpose; and yet only last winter we tried in vain to punish offenders. It was demonstrated that men will use their own money and lock it up when and where they please. A Wall street sharper, with ten million United States notes, (under this proposed machinery,) would get from the United States Treasury ten million three sixty-five bonds. Returning to New York, any national or State bank or private banker would loan at a high rate of interest ten million upon his ten million three sixty-five bonds, convertible on demand into United States notes. With this process repeated over and over again for ten days, a panic would be inevitable from the locking up of fifty or a hundred millions.

We are told that it would enable commerce to expand and contract the currency as needed. I confess that through it there would be expansion and there would at times be contraction, but never at the beck of commerce. Men want stability in finance before capital will leave its places of rest and enter the fields of industry. Take for illustration a city of twenty-five thousand population; the average amount of deposits gathered from the floating capital of the people is $1,000,000. It is the earnings of the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer. Its use through loans by the banks to citizens at home stimulates enterprise, from which all the people derive employment and wealth. This opportunity of interest in a safe investment, convertible into currency on demand, would take away one-half of the million owned and used at home to be locked up idle in Washington. To assert that this money would flow back when wanted by commerce is to assert an ignorance of the laws of individual necessities. A few patriotic citizens might respond to the wants of other people; but men owning money keep it to use for their own necessities, which may require it to-day, to-morrow, or next year.

The scheme is not new; it has been mooted for years. It is, at first impression, fascinating in the extreme, and has many votaries; but weigh it in probable experience, and it is dangerous and wicked. It would create financial anarchy in any country that should adopt it.

Its advocates tell us that the Government pays 5 per cent. on $400,000,000 of its bonds to banks which it could get in this way at 3.65. Let us see what interest the Government pays our banks. They hold $400,000,000 bonds, upon which the Government pays, at 5 per cent., $20,000,000. The banks hold also $150,000,000 in United States notes as reserves, upon which the Government pays no interest. The bonds are placed with them at rest, which is a great advantage for any government, for the market can never be disturbed by their presence, as it can be by bonds held in private hands, or in foreign lands, at the will of the holder. On this $550,000,000 Government indebtedness, held in repose by the banks, we pay 5 per cent. on the $400,000,000, which is equal to 3.63 per cent. interest upon the $550,000,000. Hence the old, tried, safe method underbids the new experiment by .02 per cent. Then, too, the national banks have paid $100,000,000 taxes to the Government since their charters were granted. Take this from the interest, and the rate is very low. I do not understand that the three sixty-five gentlemen propose to collect any taxes through their process. The banks themselves do their present business and pay their own expenses. The three sixty-five advocates propose that the Government pay its own expenses of cost of notes, counting, recounting, and do their business for nothing! I trust that the calm judgment of this House will not venture upon this new experiment. I feel kindly toward the advocates of this measure, for their aims are patriotic, though their policy would prove disastrous.

I entreat them to compass their aims through free banking and practical redemption. Let us as one man come to the rescue of our prostrate industries and idle willing labor, remembering that if we do not, others will take our places who will; for no power under heaven can chain down the determined energies and activities of the men whose homes are on the soil of this Republic, energies as irrepressible as the air we breathe. Nature, generous and free, toils no more unceasingly than they.

Willing material elements respond to willing hands. Elements of usefulness to mankind, buried through the ages in death-like slumber, leap to life and are harnessed for toil forevermore, through the quick flash of the genius of the workers of our day. Millionaire bullionists may cry "Stop!" "Stop!" but only in vain. Money is not the god of this age; it is only the obedient servant of progress.

Mr. HUNTER obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 108) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California;

A bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps; and

A bill (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] proceeds, I desire to say that several gentlemen have expressed a desire to discuss this bill at an evening session. If my colleague will allow me, I will ask that after he shall have concluded his remarks, the House shall take a recess until half-past seven; the session to-night to be devoted to debate only upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that arrangement will be made. The Chair hears none.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the session of to-morrow be also for debate on this bill. I make that motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I had understood that it was arranged that the Committee on Banking and Currency should have to-day, and that to-morrow would be given for the consideration of private bills. There has been nothing done with the Private Calendar for two weeks.

Mr. MAYNARD. I did not make the motion suggested by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL;] not because I did not desire that the action of the House might take that direction, but because, to speak candidly, I was afraid of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] and his host of friends who were pressing the consideration of private bills.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. There was no disposition, so far as I know, to prevent the Committee on Banking and Currency from having this day; but I understood that the committee—and I conversed with a number of them—were entirely willing that to-morrow should be given to the Private Calendar. And I had supposed that that was the understanding which would be adhered to.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the motion which I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would require unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that there are a great number of names down of gentlemen who desire to speak. The members of the committee may speak generally as they please, but if to-morrow should be devoted to debate only on this bill, it would give an opportunity to a great many gentlemen who desire to address the House upon it which they otherwise would not have.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] will consent to this arrangement, that the session of to-morrow shall be for debate only on this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not wish to be understood as myself opposing that arrangement. For myself I am quite willing that it should be made, if such is the general wish of the House. I feel the great importance of this subject, and I do not desire in any way to antagonize the progress of the bill. At the same time it is well known to the House that Friday and Saturday are the only days on which private business can be considered. We have given no attention at all to private bills for two weeks, and I need not suggest to the House that it is important that private business shall be proceeded with. As I have said, however, I have no desire to antagonize the pending bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that it would accomplish the object desired by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] if, along with the arrangement that to-morrow shall be devoted to debate on the banking and currency bill, there shall also be an understanding that Friday and Saturday of next week shall be devoted exclusively to private bills.

Mr. MYERS. That is right.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have no objection to the session of to-morrow being for debate only on the currency bill, on the understanding suggested by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that arrangement will be made, and to-morrow will be devoted to debate only on the banking and currency bill, it being understood that Friday and Saturday of next week, which are objection days, shall be devoted to private bills. The Chair hears no objection to that arrangement, and it is made.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

[Mr. HUNTER addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on War Claims, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 217) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam-machinery; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT TILLSON & CO.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2699) for the relief of Robert Tillson & Co., of Quincy, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON FORESTS OF THURINGIA.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives one thousand copies of the Report on Forests and Forest Culture of Thuringia, by Henry J. Winser, United States consul at Sonneberg.

ALLOWANCE TO ARMY OFFICERS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to this House a statement of all allowances of every kind made to officers of the Army stationed in the city of Washington, giving in detail the names and rank of the officers, the duties performed, the length of time each has been stationed in said city, the amount allowed to each, and the authority of law under which such allowance has been made.

Mr. COBURN. I object to the adoption of the resolution. That information has already been furnished.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the adoption of the resolution, it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was referred accordingly.

HEIRS OF JAMES B. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2700) amendatory to an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, introduced bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2702) to relieve William G. Jones, of Alabama, of political disabilities; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2703) to relieve John Forsyth, of Alabama, of political disabilities.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why did not the gentleman put the two names in one bill?

Mr. BROMBERG. I put them in separate bills because the Senate is so critical in its action upon bills of this character.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the Senate object to one of the names they can strike it out.

Mr. BROMBERG. Well, that is the reason why I put the names in separate bills.

The bills received their several readings, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) were passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1037) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2451) to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TOWNSEND was granted leave of absence from to-morrow morning until April 4.

Mr. GLOVER was granted leave of absence for two weeks on account of sickness in his family.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, which I propose to offer to the pending currency bill, be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, bills from the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. No. 108) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California, to the Committee on Military Affairs;

A bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, to the Committee on Military Affairs; and

A bill (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bills were severally referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered that there shall be a session this evening at half-past seven o'clock for debate only on the currency bill. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BUCKNER, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore. The House has also ordered that the session of to-morrow shall be for the same purpose only, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. MACDOUGALL, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

CHARGES AGAINST UNITED STATES MARSHALS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to offer the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and which I desire to have acted on at once, as the matter is one of great importance.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas complaints are made alleging improper, illegal, and oppressive conduct in the marshal's office for the northern district of Georgia, it being alleged that the deputy marshals harass and oppress the people by illegal arrests and the extortion of money from them unjustly for which they do not account and to which they are not entitled, and that they compromise cases with parties illegally, receiving money and charging exorbitant fees therefor, of which they make no returns: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the alleged abuses and report thereon to this House, and that, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. DAWES. Is that before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks consent to offer it.

Mr. DAWES. I object, unless it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is the proper committee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. If the gentleman will allow it to come before the House I will strike out the preamble.

Mr. WHITELEY. I object to its reference to any committee, for this reason: the Department of Justice can have the truth or falsity of these charges investigated by a special agent much cheaper than it can be done by this process.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Well, I have a reason for offering it——

Mr. MAYNARD. It is not before the House, and I must object to debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask, then, that it be referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. WHITELEY] objects to that.

EDWARD O'MAGHER CONDON.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted a report upon the petition of Edward O'Magher Condon, a citizen of the United States, now in prison in England; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House now take a recess.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report just submitted by me was recommitted.

The SPEAKER. It had better be understood that the motion to reconsider has been entered, because that makes the subject of the report a privileged question.

Mr. DAWES. I must object, because it will give it a preference over other business of the House.

The SPEAKER. It had better be settled now, because it may cause trouble in the House hereafter when the question is called up. Where a committee is regularly called and reports a matter for printing and recommitment, they have a privileged right to enter a motion to reconsider. But where unanimous consent is asked to make a motion for printing and recommitment, and that is immediately followed by entering a motion to reconsider, the Chair would consider that an objection would pertain to the whole matter.

Mr. DAWES. I will withdraw my objection, upon the statement of the gentleman that it refers to the personal liberty of an American citizen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only wanted the matter fully understood.

Mr. DAWES. I only objected because I thought it would give this subject a preference over other matters, and to hear an explanation, if it should be given, why it should have that preference. Having heard that explanation I withdraw my objection.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I renew the objection.

Mr. COX. This report will not be brought back into the House again except when the Committee on Foreign Affairs is called.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then why enter a motion to reconsider? I certainly must object, because the gentleman can accomplish all he wants in the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair called the attention of the House to it so that there should not be any surprise in the matter.

Mr. COX. All we ask to do in this matter is what has been done so many times in the case of other committees, to have a report printed and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. Te gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] does not comprehend the point. The motion to print and recommit the report was made and agreed to without objection. Then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] asked leave to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted, which would make this subject privileged to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. BANNING. As there seems to be objection, I will withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must insist upon my motion for a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. BUCKNER in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, the session of to-night will be for debate only on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

THE NATIONAL REVENUE—TAXATION ON FOREIGN PRODUCTIONS.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, in considering revenue questions it should be borne in mind that since 1865 the public debt has been reduced over $600,000,000, and that fully one-third of this amount has been raised by internal-revenue taxation. And now, just emerging from a financial crisis, it appears to me plainly the duty of the House to consider whether taxation under the internal-revenue system shall not be reduced.

Internal taxation is paid wholly by the American people, and, having drawn during the past eight years this large amount, it is time I think for rest and recuperation.

THE SUICIDAL POLICY—THE SINKING FUND.

The rapid reduction of the public debt has been a favorite scheme of the Treasury Department, and to carry out the design Congress established a sinking fund to which the surplus revenues of the Treasury could be applied, and it was deemed advisable to make ample provision for this fund by taxation in order to secure "the extinguishment of the whole debt by the generation that created it." The wisdom of enforcing this policy so soon after the dreadful loss of life and productive labor, and the vast destruction of property North and South during the war, has been questioned by many thoughtful persons. The policy of drawing now upon an overburdened and exhausted people the means to liquidate a great debt, created to benefit and bless not only the present generation but succeeding generations of the Republic for all time to come, is at variance with the well-settled principles of political economy; besides, the proposition is unjust and wrong.

THE PUBLIC DEBT SHOULD NOT BE PAID BY THIS GENERATION.

In 1867, the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report estimated that the population of the country in 1884 would be 60,978,838. Now, on that basis our population in 1890 will exceed eighty millions, and thus, by the increase of population alone, the debt becomes reduced one-half without the payment of a dollar. I think the present generation has done well enough, and, in my judgment, not another dollar should be raised to apply on the principal of the public debt until we are able to wipe out the whole internal-revenue system which now irritates the people with vexatious and inquisitorial taxation—a taxation wholly unjustifiable and unnecessary, except it be tolerated to gratify the vanity of some of our Treasury chiefs in the flourishing of trumpets over magnificent reductions of the public debt. They all take great glory in extracting means from the people by burdensome and crushing taxation in order to pay a debt not due for many years to come. I do not believe in the policy of bleeding the people for this purpose and at this time. Sir, if a man owes you his labor, would you by merciless blood-letting reduce him to a condition of weakness and helplessness, and thus make it impossible for him to perform the task? The public debt must be worked out, and therefore I favor the policy of lightening the burden of the people, and keeping the labor of the country in full exercise. Let the people gather strength, leave the capital and the earnings of labor in their hands for the present, and thus by aiding them in the production of individual and national wealth, the payment of the debt in the future is doubly assured.

I think, therefore, the large payments now required for the sinking fund might be postponed, and I have introduced a bill for that purpose. This would relieve the Treasury of about $25,000,000 per annum. If this be done, and a wise adjustment of the tariff be made, I think the entire internal-revenue system can be abolished within two years.

THE STAMP-TAX ON MATCHES.

Early in the session I submitted a bill for the repeal of the stamp-tax on friction matches and bank checks, and the Committee on Ways and Means having reported adversely upon the bill, it is now before the House for consideration. The tax on matches is almost wholly borne by the industrial classes. The poor laboring man consumes more matches than the millionaire, and eighty cents on every dollar's worth of matches is in the form of stamps; therefore on every ten boxes of matches the poor man pays the Government for eight boxes of internal-revenue stamps. The tax is exorbitant, unequally and unjustly levied, and should, in my judgment, be immediately repealed. And it should be borne in mind that honest manufacturers find a great deal of embarrassment in carrying on this industry on account of the dishonesty practiced by unscrupulous manufacturers, who cheat in putting up packages and in stamping their goods. This is an additional and powerful reason why this stamp-tax should be removed.

THE STAMP-TAX ON BANK-CHECKS.

The stamp-tax on bank checks, while it yields but an insignificant amount of revenue, is a very annoying and troublesome form of taxation. Each check or order for money requires a two-cent stamp on all sums over ten dollars. Now the stamp costs two cents, and the labor of attaching the stamp is worth at least two cents more. So the people are taxed $3,000,000, and the Treasury receives only about a million and a half dollars. Beside, in many cases in remote places, it is inconvenient, if not impossible, to obtain stamps, and in this way it is a chafing, vexatious, and annoying tax. And although the internal-revenue act provides for heavy penalties for violations of the law, yet it is often neglected either by necessity or design.

I see before me the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, wherein it is stated that over five thousand suits or prosecutions are now pending for violations of the internal-revenue laws, and I am informed that a very large number of these cases are prosecutions for evading the stamp-tax on matches, druggists' goods, and bank checks.

THE STAMP-TAX ON PRESCRIPTIONS AND MEDICINES.

The stamp-tax required on druggists' goods is equally obnoxious. It is almost impossible, even for the most intelligent, to understand what goods require the stamp. And thousands of druggists, in their anxiety to obey the law, affix stamps to goods, which by others are sold without stamps, and it appears that internal-revenue officers, even, do not understand the law, and certain articles recently have been declared liable to a stamp-tax which for seven long years have been regarded as exempt. I see before me a great book to expound the law issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the object of which is to designate and define the goods required by existing laws to be stamped. If any law providing for taxation is so difficult to be understood as to require the Commissioner to issue a work of this description to explain its provisions it should be repealed, and inasmuch as these stamps yield but about $2,500,000, I am in favor of wiping out this tax on druggists' goods.

REDUCE TAXATION ON DOMESTIC PRODUCTS AND RAISE THE REQUIRED REVENUE BY TAXATION ON FOREIGN PRODUCTS.

We have thus far heard six members of the Committee on Ways and Means. They suggest no revenue measures, and they differ widely with reference to the receipts and expenditures for the current fiscal year, and in their estimate of the surplus or balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July. The chairman contends that we shall have not to exceed $20,000,000 surplus, not including the reserve of $44,000,000. Another member maintains with great clearness that we shall have at least $35,000,000. And still another member of the committee makes a showing so plain that no one can dispute it, that by the 1st of July we will have a surplus of at least $42,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, should we have a surplus of not more than $10,000,000, I insist that this tax on matches, bank checks, and druggists' goods, and also the taxation on spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and grapes, has a depressing effect on this young industry now growing into importance in thirty-one of the States and Territories of the Union. I favor the policy of reducing taxation on domestic products, having in view the repeal of the internal-revenue laws, and the raising of all the revenue required by taxation on foreign products.

THE LARGE REDUCTION EFFECTED BY ACT JUNE 6, 1872.

On the 6th of June, 1872, the duties on imports were reduced, which resulted in a dead loss to the Treasury for eleven months, ending the 30th of June, 1873, of $19,356,257, as shown by the report of the Bureau of Statistics. I have submitted a bill (H. R. No. 2399) "to increase the revenue from imports and to reduce internal-revenue taxation," which I hope may be adopted as a substitute to the pending bill. Now, estimating the reduction of internal revenue on the basis of the receipts for the last fiscal year, the aggregate reduction will not exceed $10,000,000; and for the information of the House I send to the Clerk to be read a statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which sustains the estimates I have made.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 28, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of yesterday, I have to inform you that the receipts for the last fiscal year from the two-cent tax on bank checks, drafts, or orders, from friction matches, and from medicines, cosmetics, &c., were, in round numbers, as follows:

Bank checks, &c	$1,600,000
Friction matches	2,450,000
Articles taxed under Schedule C, exclusive of matches	2,510,000
Spirits distilled from apples, peaches, and grapes	2,014,645

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. MOSES W. FIELD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

A REDUCTION OF $10,000,000 INTERNAL TAXATION AND AN INCREASE OF REVENUE BY RESTORATION OF "THE TEN PER CENT. REDUCTION," ETC., YIELDING $13,000,000 TO THE TREASURY.

Mr. FIELD. In urging the repeal of this amount of taxation on the one hand, I propose on the other an increase of the revenue from imports which will more than cover the proposed reduction; and I submit a statement, showing the large increase in the revenue which may be derived from an alteration of the tariff.

The report of the Bureau of Statistics, now on our tables, shows that the "10 per cent. reduction" in the act of the 6th of June, 1872, resulted in a loss to the Treasury, for eleven months, of over $9,000,000; and the duties on articles specified in section 1 of the same act were also reduced, resulting in a loss of revenue amounting to over $900,000; and on other commodities specified in the same act the loss to the Treasury by a reduction of duties was over $3,000,000; making the total loss of revenue under said act over $19,000,000. I propose a repeal of these reductions in part. I propose a repeal of sections 1 and 2 of the act referred to, which will increase the revenue for the coming fiscal year at least $9,889,419. The other alterations in the rates of duty, as proposed by the bill, are set forth in the statement which I shall submit, together with an estimate of the revenue which will be derived therefrom, making an aggregate increase of over $13,000,000 in the revenue for the next fiscal year. This estimate is made on the basis of the receipts on the articles mentioned during the last fiscal year; a statement of which in detail, together with the estimates of the amount of revenue each commodity is calculated to produce, I now submit, and ask to have printed in the RECORD.

Comparative statement of the reduction of revenue derived from duties on imports, computed on the basis of the returns of merchandise entered into consumption in the United States during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1871, 1872, and 11 months of 1873, under the act of June 6, 1872, and the estimated reduction of customs receipts, together with estimates of the increase of revenue by restoration of former rates of duty.

THE 10 PER CENT. REDUCTION PUT OVER $9,000,000 INTO THE POCKETS OF FOREIGNERS.

I ask gentlemen to examine these statements with care, and I think it will appear plain that "the 10 per cent. reduction" should be restored. That reduction time has proven to have been a foolish cutting down of revenue, resulting in the loss to the Treasury of the large amount I have stated, and all the benefits falling into the hands of foreign producers just as plainly as an appropriation by Congress could transfer the money. The prices of the commodities in this country were not altered by the reduction of duties, and consequently all the benefits of this generous act fell into the hands of foreign producers. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the large number of petitions presented here from the farmers of Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan, and New York in favor of higher duties on foreign hops, and I propose to increase the duties from five cents per pound to ten cents per pound. This modification will increase the revenue from hops, say, $280,445.

I propose, also, a slight increase in the duties on tin, hemp, soda ash, and sal soda.

The present duty on building stone is prohibitory, being $1.50 per ton. This rate appears in the statute, but undoubtedly it was a typographical error, as the "toi," a technical word used by masons, was intended instead of ton. I propose to fix the duty at 10 per cent. ad valorem.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF TAXATION.

The reduction of internal-revenue taxation and the repeal of the existing duties on licorice are estimated as follows:

On licorice, juice, paste, and root, (customs)	$194,080
Spirits, distilled from apples, peaches, and grapes	2,014,645
Bank checks	1,600,000

Prescriptions, proprietary and other articles, Schedule C	2,510,000
Farmers' sales of leaf-tobacco	230,857

TAXATION ON FOREIGN PRODUCTIONS THE TRUE POLICY.

As I have stated, the revenue derived from imports is paid almost wholly by foreign labor. I have heard gentlemen here speak of the burdens imposed upon the American people by tariff taxation, but this is a great mistake. The revenue derived from imports is wrung from the hands of foreign producers. When they approach our markets with the products of their labor, they are required to call at the captain's office and settle the duties which our tariff requires. It is like the toll which is sometimes paid in crossing a bridge that leads to a market. That toll comes from the person who seeks that market, the producer, not the consumer. And so with the products of foreign labor. Before they can be laid down or sold to consumers in our markets, the producer is required to call at the custom-house and settle the duties, and the receipts into the Treasury from this source during the last fiscal year have been $184,929,041.

COMMENTS ON MR. BECK'S FREE-TRADE SPEECH.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in a recent speech on the finances, made some reference to the tariff; and in the course of his remarks he characterized the collection of revenue on importations of foreign manufactures as "the outrageous system of tariff taxation that is bringing about all our financial and commercial troubles." I confess my surprise on hearing this remark, for the gentleman, being a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, must be familiar with the tariff, and the gentleman knows that the free list embraces all commodities not conveniently produced in the United States, and that duties under the existing tariff are imposed only on such manufactures and productions of foreign countries as compete with like productions in our own. I fail, therefore, to see how custom-house taxation on foreign products can disturb our finances, as such taxation, while yielding a large revenue to the Treasury, can only have the effect to stimulate labor and augment productions in this country.

SILK GOODS.

Now, if all the silk goods required to supply our markets could be produced in this country, more laborers would be employed here, creating greater demands for labor, and the money required to pay for the labor would be expended here instead of being shipped to foreign countries to reward and support labor there, while thousands remain idle in the United States for want of employment.

TAKING WORK OUT OF THE COUNTRY ROBBING AMERICAN LABORERS.

If I understand the gentleman, he is anxious to stop all the works now in operation in this country, and he favors a policy which would discharge the workmen now employed in our workshops and factories, and employ people in Europe and Asia to do the work to supply our markets; and the gentleman proposes to ship gold and silver to pay for their labor. If I understand the gentleman, the "remodeling of the tariff" so as to secure this result will, in his opinion, improve our finances and make us wealthy and prosperous. Considering that labor is wealth, I fail to perceive any advantage in the proposed transfer of our diversified employments to foreign countries; on the contrary, I affirm that if the policy of the gentleman be carried into execution it would lead us swiftly and with certainty to ruin and wide-spread disaster. It would, moreover, rob the Treasury of the required revenue and rob our industrious people of a large share of their labor.

I desire to comment further on another part of the gentleman's speech, and that I may do him no injustice, I will ask to have the paragraphs which I have marked read, and I send them to the Clerk's desk for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

I rose principally for the purpose of calling attention to one portion of the tariff question. There is a highly respectable set of gentlemen here, or were lately, known as the representatives of the Silk Association of America, whose books are no doubt on all your tables, who are seeking in every way to increase the tariff on silk manufactures, which is now 60 per cent. in gold, equal on an average to 75 per cent. in the currency of the country. They are making complaint as though they were about to be ruined, because a few mixed ribbons that have some cotton or some wool in them have been allowed to come into the country at a tax on the consumer of 50 per cent. gold. They are here clamoring for Congress to increase the duties on them also to the 60 per cent. rule, in order, as they claim, to make the tax uniform, and protect them in their industries.

Several of these gentlemen, I will not say where, have been discussing this question in my presence. And when I was insisting upon putting the tariff upon all these articles down to 50 per cent. instead of allowing mixed ribbons to be advanced to 60, as being a sufficient protection and bonus to them, the cry was at once raised by them, "You will drive us out of business if you do that; we cannot live at that figure." The question was then asked, "What is the amount of your production of silk?" The answer was, "About $30,000,000 a year." What is the amount of silk imported? The books show that it is about $30,000,000; therefore the consumption of silk is about $60,000,000, $30,000,000 of it imported. Counting all the imports at 60 per cent., we get a revenue of about $18,000,000 out of a consumption of $60,000,000. Reduce the tariff to 50 per cent. and drive all these gentlemen out of the business if you please; the consumption of silk in this country will not be less, but by the natural operation of the increase of the people, and in consequence of the reduction of duty, the consumption would doubtless reach $70,000,000. Fifty per cent. upon $70,000,000 would produce $35,000,000 of revenue if all these manufacturers should quit the business.

They state that all their machinery, all their material, all their property, at the highest estimate they put upon it, will reach only $15,000,000. They employ, say twelve thousand men, beside women and children. It is obvious from their own statements, and will be apparent to every gentleman who looks at it, that if you reduce the duties on silk from 60 per cent. to 50 per cent., and, if you please, drive all these men out of the manufacture entirely, you would instantly get $35,000,000 of revenue instead of $18,000,000. In that way, in one year, you could get an excess of revenue which would enable you to pay them their $15,000,000, every dollar that they have invested in the business, and you would have $2,000,000, or enough to furnish $1,000 apiece to each man they employ, with which he could buy a farm in the West, and stock it. We would get $35,000,000 a year from the silk consumption alone, from which we are now getting only $18,000,000. And yet these men are clamoring for a still further increase of protection to their productions, which would result in diminishing our revenues. That is only one case; there are hundreds of others of the same sort, illustrating equally well the working of the present high protective, anti-revenue tariff taxation.

A DREARY SUGGESTION—A PLAN FOR IMPROVING THE FINANCES BY PAUPERIZING THE PEOPLE.

Mr. FIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky says it requires $60,000,000 worth of silk to supply the American markets, and at the present time our factories produce about one-half that quantity, the residue of the supply, say $30,000,000, coming from abroad, and yielding $18,000,000 revenue to the Treasury. Now, if the $30,000,000 worth of silk which we imported last year had been manufactured in the United States at least twelve thousand more laborers would have found employment here in the production of the work, and the shipment of $30,000,000 to pay the foreign laborers would not have drained the country of that amount of treasure. But the gentleman, not satisfied with robbing our people, with one-half of this labor, now proposes that all this work shall be done in foreign countries; and with that view he favors a reduction of the duties on silk goods as "a revenue measure," and to "help the finances." He says, "Put the duty at a point low enough to drive American manufacturers out of the business; in that event all the silk goods to supply our markets will be produced abroad, and although our people will send off gold across the Atlantic to pay for the labor employed there in making the silks for the American people, yet the duties on the importations of the goods would swell the revenues of the Treasury." He thinks it would help our financial situation to ship $60,000,000 in gold instead of the $30,000,000 now required to pay for such manufactures in Europe.

SNATCHING LABOR OUT OF THE HANDS OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

This is the grand financial and economic scheme of the gentleman from Kentucky. He says, we now pay foreign labor $30,000,000 to make our silks in part; and in order to offer them more of our work, he proposes to say to the men and women at work in our great factories, "Get out; this is your country, but you have no rights here that your Representatives are bound to respect." The gentleman proposes to "drive out" by hostile legislation the manufacturers in our workshops producing $30,000,000 annually of silks in the United States, and consequently creating that much of wealth in our own country—this young industry, now maintaining here over two hundred firms in the business, employing over twelve thousand persons in the work, and paying over $6,000,000 in wages per annum to our people. Now, if the gentleman's theory be correct with regard to silks, it will apply to all other industries; and, if carried out, we should exhibit the spectacle of a great nation of intelligent laborers—laborers doing the voting and governing the country for their own welfare and independence—adopting a policy which would transfer all their useful industries to foreign lands, strip them completely of their work, leaving at home a vast multitude of idle people, without work, without morals, and without civilization.

MAY GOD SAVE US.

May God save us, Mr. Speaker, from such a deplorable condition of dependence and slavery. Sir, we want no ornamental figure-heads in this country. We want active, useful people, and the diversified pursuits to give employment for all, that from our many industries we may witness one prosperity. If our work be done at home it is wealth and gain, if done abroad it is poverty and loss; and the $30,000,000 sent abroad last year to pay for silk work drains our country of that much treasure and robs our countrymen of that amount of labor.

Which policy, sir, I ask, is the best for a nation of laborers—the policy which would strip them of their occupations and support labor in other countries, or that other policy which would secure to them the labor required to supply home demands and their home markets?

PRICES CHANGEABLE AS THE WEATHERCOCK.

The gentleman makes no calculation, too, for changes in the prices of silk goods should the plan he suggests be carried out. Let him buy up the silk-works in this country and destroy them as proposed, turn out of employment the twelve thousand people now supported by this industry, and what would be the result? Why, high prices for silk goods would be inevitable. The destruction of our silk manufactories would cause an advance in prices for silks in Europe; and instead of getting the silks for $60,000,000, undoubtedly 50 per cent. more money would be required, making the cost, say $90,000,000. Meanwhile, our people deprived of a large amount of work, and consequently suffering serious loss and inconvenience, the revenues of the Treasury, instead of increasing, would drop to the poverty line of repudiation and disgrace.

"KILLING THE GOOSE."

If the policy be worth anything, I say, it should be applied to all manufacturing industries; and in carrying out the death-dealing scheme we should plunder the people of their mechanical work, reduce them to rude and barbarous employments, and thus kill the goose that lays the golden egg, not only for the Treasury, but for the prosperity and happiness of the American people.

THE DUTY ON BUTTER PAID BY CANADIANS; PRICES FIXED BY "SUPPLY AND DEMAND."

I find by the statement of the Bureau of Statistics that for the last fiscal year the importations of butter were 4,178,224 pounds, which, with the duty at 4 cents per pound, yielded $167,128 revenue. Now the price of butter in our markets was not affected by this importation; but the Canadians or others who shipped this butter took the American price, the same price our farmers got for a like quality, paying a duty, however, of 4 cents per pound before the butter could be sold in our markets. If we remit the duty on butter, the foreign producer would realize just that much more. It cannot be claimed that by repealing the duty the price of butter in our markets would be 4 cents per pound less. Prices are not fixed by law; they are not regulated by treaties; they are controlled and fixed by the natural law of supply and demand. And as our domestic producers furnish the overwhelming supply, you will see that prices in American markets are fixed here, uninfluenced by the insignificant quantity which from year to year may be imported. The annual production of butter by the United States is estimated by the Department of Agriculture at 600,000,000 pounds, and with this supply in our own country, it is impossible for prices to be affected by the small quantity imported.

CHEESE, POULTRY, BACON, AND TALLOW.

Cheese was imported amounting to 3,440,436 pounds, paying a duty of 4 cents per pound, and yielding in the aggregate $137,618. This amount was paid into the Treasury by the foreign producer of cheese.

Poultry was imported amounting to $93,767. The duty being 10 per cent., the Canadians were obliged to pay $9,376 into the Treasury before they could sell their poultry in our markets.

The duty on hams is 2 cents per pound, and 118,852 pounds having been imported, the Treasury received $2,377 in gold on foreign bacon and hams.

The duty on tallow is 1 cent per pound, and the duty on lard is 2 cents per pound, yielding a handsome revenue to the Treasury.

FIRE-WOOD—THE REPEAL OF THE DUTY PUT FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS INTO THE POCKETS OF CANADIANS.

Fire-wood was imported in 1872 to the amount of $201,960, paying a duty of 20 per cent., and yielding to the Treasury $40,392; but on the 1st of August, 1872, this duty was repealed, and since that time no revenue has been collected or received from this source. It was a great mistake, in my judgment, to repeal this duty, and I propose to reinstate it as it was prior to 1872. Living, as I do, upon the border, and seeing the Canadian and the American selling wood in the same market, I will speak of fire-wood as an illustration of the ground I have taken that customs duties are paid by foreigners. Prior to August 1, 1872, the duty was 20 per cent., and before the Canadian could dispose of his wood in our market he was obliged to call at the custom-house and pay the duties. It is hardly worth while for me to state, for it is a notorious fact, that in every case the foreign producer accepts the American market price for his wood. To illustrate, I will suppose the price to have been five dollars per cord, and the duty amounting to one dollar per cord; then the Canadian realizes four dollars per cord for his wood, while the American in the same market, for the same quality of wood, gets the full market price of five dollars, for he has no duty to pay. But after the 1st of August the Canadian disposed of his wood in our market, and, there being no longer a duty upon it, he went home with the entire avails, receiving the same price as the American for the same quality of wood. The market price was not altered by the reduction of duty. The price in the market continued, with slight variations, for a short time, and then the price went up. The Forty-second Congress, therefore, in repealing the duty on fire-wood, generously put into the pockets of the Canadians at least $40,000 in gold per annum.

HAY.

The duty on hay is 20 per cent., yielding to the Treasury last year $81,235, and in 1872 the revenue derived from this source was $140,432. Some gentlemen may think that the price is made by reason of this duty 20 per cent. higher all over the country. I wish it could be so. I should be very glad if by imposing high duties we could raise the price of the hay and the wheat and the potatoes produced in the West and all over this great country. But such is not the case. The quantity imported as compared with the domestic production is too insignificant to affect the price in any case or at any point. The total value of the hay imported last year was less than $500,000; whereas the value of the crop of the United States is estimated at $400,000,000. Therefore to assert that the quantity imported has any effect upon the prices in the American markets would be as absurd as to contend that a glass of lager-beer thrown into the river at the Point of Rocks would produce such a flood in the Potomac as to sweep the Washington Monument into the Chesapeake Bay.

HOPS—THE DUTY SHOULD BE TEN CENTS PER POUND.

The duty on hops is five cents per pound, and my desire is that it should be raised to ten cents per pound. Why should we allow the Canadians to come into our markets and glut them with their hops, paying only five cents per pound for the right and privilege of selling them here, when by imposing ten cents per pound we would double the revenue? And I propose that we shall, after the first of July next, charge the Canadians at least ten cents per pound for the privilege of selling their hops in our markets. These markets belong to the American people. The country is theirs, and the markets of the country belong to them; and they have a right to demand that foreigners, when they seek our markets, shall be required to call and pay duties before they can compete with the farmers here on their own ground. The farmers of Wisconsin, of Michigan, of New York, and Ohio, can supply our markets with hops. The production of these States during the past year has exceeded 30,000,000 pounds, but if we are to allow foreigners to crowd our producers out of our own markets by reducing the duties or making the duties ineffectual and non-productive, then our own farmers will be compelled to throw up their hands, and we shall, in this way, stimulate and augment foreign labor to the detriment of our own. The quantity of this staple imported is very small as compared with our domestic production, yet it is an injury to have so large a quantity thrown upon our markets, thereby delaying the sale possibly of the products of our own farmers. Hops must be sold when the crop is fresh, and if the market is to be glutted by Canadians, it may result in great injury to our own producers. But as the Government requires revenue, although we have the right as American producers to claim the whole market, yet, on the payment of ten cents per pound duty, the farmers of the West will be satisfied; and with this alteration we can calculate that for the next fiscal year the revenue from this source, instead of being $280,445, shall be at least $500,000.

HONEY.

The duty on honey is twenty cents a gallon, and the quantity imported last year was 102,736 gallons, yielding $20,547 revenue.

VEGETABLES.

The duty on vegetables is 10 per cent., and the quantity imported having been $495,952, the revenue derived from this source was $63,158. Now I am aware that some persons contend that the vegetables produced in the gardens and on the farms of the Dominion of Canada should be admitted free of duty; but I fail to see on what ground this claim is made. These markets certainly are ours, and if they are to be supplied by Canadians or any other foreign farmers, our own gardeners and farmers will be injured thereby. I believe the duty should be at least 20 per cent. on vegetables; and if by so doing we can check the importation, it will be as well for our own producers, and probably the Treasury will receive as much, if not more, money, by imposing 20 per cent. than it now receives while the duty is only 10 per cent. The question is, have not our own gardeners and farmers better rights here in our own markets than foreigners? Do foreigners pay our taxes to maintain our schools and libraries? Do they pay for carrying on this Government? Have they upon their shoulders the great debt incurred to save the Republic they have attempted twice to break down? Have we not the farmers and the gardeners in our own country who can supply our markets with vegetables? I think you, sir, will agree with me in concluding that we have. I insist then, that if foreigners are to be permitted to sell their truck and stuff in our markets, they shall be required, before doing so, to call at the custom-house and pay the duties required by our tariff.

POTATOES.

On the 1st of August, 1872, the duty on potatoes was reduced 10 cents per bushel, thereby putting into the pockets of the Canadians and the people of Bermuda 10 cents in cash on every bushel of potatoes which they have sold in our markets since that time. The revenue derived from this source in 1871, when the duty was 25 cents per bushel, was $107,985. I have no doubt there are some gentlemen here who would be willing to have this duty removed wholly; but I have to say to such gentlemen that in so doing we will put this money into the hands of those who come from abroad to sell their potatoes in our markets. Let the duty be raised to the former rate, which was 25 cents per bushel. It cannot be claimed that the price of potatoes is reduced in our markets by repealing the duty. Those who live on or near the frontier know that this is not so. The farmer from Canada, when he sells potatoes in our markets, accepts the market price, and when we exact a duty that duty must be deducted from the price in estimating the net avails of his crop. The quantity imported, you will perceive, has never exceeded 500,000 bushels, while the product of the United States is over 130,000,000 bushels per annum. I know that free-traders sometimes contend that the duties imposed by the tariff are paid by the American people; and they sometimes go even beyond that and claim that the amount of the duty is not only added to the price simply of the quantity of the commodity imported, but that the duty has the effect to advance the price of the entire product of the United States to the full extent of the duty. And the Free-Trade League have hired men to travel all over the United States to deliver lectures upon this question, paying their expenses and advertising them liberally. These men have contended, even in the city where I reside, that this is so. And while a doctor of divinity whom they had hired for such work was dilating on the enormous wrong done the American people by the tariff advancing the prices of commodities all over the United States to the extent of the duties imposed on the quantity imported, he happened to speak of potatoes, saying, "Look at this outrageous duty the monopolists have laid, of 25 cents per bushel on potatoes imported. It has the effect," he said, "to advance the price of potatoes 25 cents per bushel all over the United States." But, Mr. Speaker, it so happened that at that very time the price of potatoes in our market was only 22 cents per bushel; therefore, according to the theory advanced by this free-trade lecturer, the farmers were required to pay 3 cents per bushel to have their potatoes taken off their hands.

DRESSED HOGS.

The duty on dressed hogs is 1 cent per pound, and the amount imported was 90,214 pounds, yielding $9,902 revenue. You will see that when the Canadian brings his hogs to our market he gets the market price for them. If the price be $6 a hundred, he obtains that price; but before he can sell them he is required to pay 1 cent per pound at the custom-house. So in returning home he carries only $5 a hundred, while the American in the same market takes the same price, $6 per hundred; but he, having no duty to settle, carries home the $6 per hundred for his hogs. Do our farmers in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, or any other State, object to that? Are our farmers anxious that Canadians shall come over here and supply our markets, and sell their productions without paying any tax for the right to do so? Mr. Speaker, did you ever hear farmers in Missouri complain about this matter; and do you think the farmers out there would like to have the duty on dressed hogs repealed?

BEEF—BARLEY.

On beef the duty is 1 cent a pound, yielding last year $4,575 in gold.

The duty on barley is 15 cents a bushel, yielding last year the handsome sum of $647,661.

LIVE HOGS, HORSES, AND SHEEP.

The duty on live hogs, horses, and sheep is 20 per cent., yielding last year $648,296.

If we remit this duty the foreign producer will go home with just that much more money. It cannot be claimed that the number of these animals imported has any effect upon prices here, for the annual product of our own country is over $1,500,000,000.

COLD BISCUIT.

The duty on cold biscuit is 20 per cent., yielding $20,508. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] object to that? Would he have our own country women robbed of that amount of labor? Would he prefer cold biscuit from London to the nice hot biscuit made by the gentlewomen of Kentucky? I know some gentlemen on this floor who wear clothing made in London. And it may give them as much satisfaction to rob American tailors of that amount of labor as it may to eat the cold biscuit produced by the London bakers instead of the better home-made. Nevertheless, on the $102,542 worth of biscuit imported during the last year, the Treasury received the handsome amount I have mentioned.

CORN.

The duty on corn is 10 cents per bushel, and the quantity imported was 61,539 bushels, yielding $6,153 in gold to the Treasury. Will any one say that corn is made 10 cents per bushel dearer thereby all over the United States, as the free-traders claim? I wish it could be so; for if it would secure that result I should favor a duty of 50 cents on every bushel of imported corn. But I think it can hardly be possible for any sane man to be humbugged by such shallow talk. In some of the Western States, for lack of a market, corn upon the farm does not bring even 10 cents per bushel to the hand of the farmer. As with other commodities, so with corn; the quantity imported, being only a drop in the bucket of our supply, does not affect our prices. The crop of the United States of over 900,000,000 bushels determines the price of this staple in our own markets; and any man must be either a knave or a fool to claim that the duty on the quantity imported affects prices in the American markets. When the Canadian brings his corn here he takes our market price, and goes home with that price after deducting the duties paid.

MACARONI AND VERMICELLI—SAINT LOUIS FLOUR TO LONDON AND BACK.

In 1871 the duty on macaroni and vermicelli was 35 per cent., yielding $29,061 revenue. By the act of June 6, 1872, the duty was repealed, and from that time the foreign producers have been benefited about $30,000 in gold per annum. And in this way we have not only robbed the Treasury, but we have robbed our own producers of macaroni and vermicelli to that extent. I know it suits some people very well to talk of having our work done in Europe. They gladly witness Saint Louis flour shipped all the way to England; and after being handled by London bakers the same flour, in neat boxes, with bright labels, is brought back to us in the shape of London crackers, vermicelli, and Italian macaroni. Is this good for the American workingman? Is it economy? Is it wise and profitable to ship Saint Louis flour to Europe, and bring back the same flour and a large amount of labor added to it in the value of the goods I have mentioned?

OATS.

The duty on oats is 10 cents per bushel, and the quantity imported last year having been 226,297 bushels, the revenue realized was $22,629 in gold. I think no one can dispute me when I assert that this amount of money was paid into the Treasury by foreign producers. This quantity certainly had no effect upon our prices, being less than a quarter of a million bushels, while the great product of the United States is 230,000,000 bushels. I repeat that the foreign producer, in selling commodities in our markets, accepts the market prices of our country; and when we require from him the payment of duties, they are paid out of his own pocket. And in this way we replenish the Treasury of our Government; restrain foreigners from monopolizing and glutting our markets with the products of their labor; shield and protect the American people, and reserve to them the national markets for their benefit.

OATMEAL.

Oatmeal was imported during the last fiscal year amounting to 3,468,000 pounds, paying a duty of ½ cent per pound, and yielding $19,657. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have factories in this country producing the finest oatmeal in the world. We do not want our markets to be crammed with Scotch groats; we want American oatmeal, the best food known for man. If the people of other countries wish to manufacture oatmeal for our markets, we only desire that they shall either come here to do the work or call and pay 1 cent per pound for the privilege of selling foreign make in our markets.

PEASE AND BEANS.

I come now to pease and beans, which pay a duty of 10 per cent., yielding to the Treasury last year $23,617. I find also that split pease pay a duty of 20 per cent., yielding a handsome revenue to the Treasury. We can split our own pease, as well as do any other kind of work that need be done; and if foreigners want to split pease for the American market, let us split 20 per cent. out of their pockets.

FURNITURE.

I find the importation of furniture to have been $448,543, which, at 35 per cent., yielded to the Treasury in gold $156,990. This amount was not paid by the American people, and I think it would be wise to charge 50 per cent. duty; but as it has been fixed at 35 per cent. I will not urge a change at the present time. We have in our country the wood, we have the material of every description, and we have the artisans and the workmen who can produce furniture suitable for any mansion in America. If foreign workers in furniture wish to sell their sofas and their tables and their chairs here, let them call at the captain's office and pay the duty of 35 per cent.

MILK.

The duty on milk is 20 per cent., and the importation having been to the value of $28,648, the receipts into the Treasury from this source were $5,609.

EGGS.

The duty on eggs in 1871 was 10 per cent., and the receipts into the Treasury from this source for the fiscal year ending June 30 were $27,867. This duty was removed by the act of June 6, 1872, and the Treasury has lost that much money during the past year from this source.

WHEAT.

The duty on wheat is 20 cents per bushel, and the quantity imported during the last fiscal year having been 1,056,345 bushels, the Treasury received $211,269 from this source. Now that amount of money was extracted from the foreign producer of wheat. It helps our Treasury, does no harm to our country, and, although our own farmers can raise wheat sufficient to supply our own market, yet we are willing, on account of the revenue which it is desirable to raise, that the Canadian shall sell wheat in our markets, provided he pays 20 cents on each bushel for the privilege of doing so. You will see that the quantity imported was a trifle over 1,000,000 bushels. The production of our country exceeds 275,000,000 bushels per annum.

When we ship wheat to England we meet there the producers of England, as well as the surplus from Germany and Russia, and we get the current price in Mark Lane, after paying all the transportation and other expenses, including the duty whenever the British Parliament levies a duty on importations of corn and wheat.

FLOUR, BRICK, AND BRUSHES.

The duty on flour is 20 per cent., yielding last fiscal year $63,522.

The duty on bricks is 20 per cent., yielding $13,484.

The duty on brushes is 40 per cent., yielding last year $157,279. If all these brushes had been made in America, over ten thousand persons would have been supported by the labor.

CARRIAGES.

The duty on carriages is 35 per cent. While we have carriage-makers competent to produce carriages of every description and of a quality superior to that of any foreign maker, yet during the past year the value of $71,572 was imported, yielding $25,050 revenue.

HYDRAULIC CEMENT.

The duty on hydraulic cement is 20 per cent., and the quantity imported last year was $209,076, yielding $41,819 revenue. We have cement in this country of every description and of superior quality. The cement produced in Kentucky, I do not hesitate to say, is superior to any imported cement; and while we have the ability to produce this article in our own country, having abundant labor here for the purpose, I think it is desirable to charge foreigners 20 per cent. on the amount imported.

GLUE, CIDER, AND WATCHES.

The duty on glue is 20 per cent., yielding $36,514 revenue.

The duty on cider is 20 per cent., and the duty on watches is 20 per cent., yielding during the last fiscal year, $787,671 revenue. If the duty on foreign watches was fixed at 50 per cent. it would cause the great factories of Europe to be transferred to our Western States, and in less than ten years the smoke of this industry would rise from many towns and villages in the West.

CLOTHING.

The value of imported clothing last year was $1,618,945, yielding $706,802 revenue to the Treasury. If this large amount of work had been reserved for our people many thousands would have obtained employment here, augmenting our labor, swelling the national wealth, and promoting the prosperity of the country. Give to the people the nation's work and we should have no poor-houses; for when the people find work they can support themselves without charity and without public work-houses.

CLOVER-SEED.

The duty on clover-seed is 20 per cent., yielding during the last year $55,844 revenue. This amount of revenue was contributed toward the support of our Government by the Canadian producers. They sell their clover-seed in our market and realize the market rate, after deducting the amount of duty paid, while the American sells clover-seed in the same market, and drives home to his farm with the whole market price in his pocket.

COAL—A PLOT TO ROB THE TREASURY, AND THROW OUR MINERS OUT OF WORK.

By the act of June 6, 1872, the duty on coal was reduced to 75 cents per ton; and during the past fiscal year 411,039 tons having been imported, the amount of revenue realized was only $308,279; while under the former duty of $1.25 per ton, in 1871, the revenue realized on 430,508 tons, was $538,135. In 1872, 485,063 tons were imported, paying a duty of $1.25 per ton, and yielding $606,329 in revenue. Therefore it will be seen that in reducing the duty 50 cents per ton we have reduced the revenue about one-half; and in so doing have put about $300,000 into the pockets of the people of Pictou and Cape Breton during the past year. This is the reason of so much cheerfulness in that country at this time, and accounts for the great rejoicing which occurred in Canada when the duty on coal was reduced 50 cents per ton. They sell no more coal in our markets than they did prior to the time the reduction took effect; but now they realize the full amount of that reduction when they ship coal to our ports. As I have said before, in legislating the tariff down we have legislated money into the hands of foreign producers. We have robbed our Treasury of a large amount of revenue, and we have encouraged labor in foreign lands, instead of supporting workingmen here at home. The price of coal was not reduced by the reduction of the duty. The price in the Boston market before and after the time the reduction took effect remained the same; but as soon as the reduction went into operation the Bluenoses of Nova Scotia went home with 50 cents a ton more money.

CONGRESS SHOULD PROTECT THE PEOPLE OF THE COUNTRY AGAINST THE LABOR OF ALL OTHERS—COAL ABUNDANT IN THE UNITED STATES.

We are here, Mr. Speaker, as I understand, to legislate for the benefit of the American people, and I fail to perceive how we are faithfully discharging our duty when we reduce the tariff, and in so doing snatch labor out of the hands of our workingmen, take money out of the Treasury of our Government, and lodge it in the pockets of foreigners. According to the statement of the Bureau of Education, we tax ourselves voluntarily in this country to the amount of $95,402,726 per annum for public libraries and for the public education of the young. Is it right to ask a people who are willing to submit to this large tax for the benefit of the rising generation, and for the future safety of the Republic, to allow foreigners to come in here and take possession of our markets, and sell the products of their labor without paying the tariff tax at the Treasury of our Government? Should foreign wars break upon us as they have in the past, can we require the coal-heavers of Cape Breton and Pictou to come here and fight our battles? Can we draft them to fill up the ranks of our depleted armies? Are we so interested in our foreign cousins that we can submit to this wrong which the American people would be compelled to suffer if we reduced the duties on imports? People who are acquainted with the business know that the price of coal in our markets is never affected by the duties imposed on foreign coal. It is only the ignorant, or the middle-men, and the Shylocks of trade, interested in foreign products and interested in the handling of such products in our markets, that attempt to poison the minds of the western people with the foolish notion that the American people pay these duties. They know that this is not so; they know that it is mischievous and shameful lying, and that they themselves are the only interested ones in a reduction of these duties. Here in our great importing cities the unfriendly Modocs may be found. They would willingly scalp American labor, and paralyze our industries, that they might take free and unrestricted possession of our markets. Now, the quantity of coal imported in any year would not supply a single industry in my State. The supply of coal in the United States is inexhaustible. Missouri alone has over 20,000 square miles of coal, and Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and scores of other States possess inexhaustible deposits. The miners working in our coal mines in the West, as well as at the East, can supply our markets with coal without the aid of foreign production, and they know, too, that if the demand for coal in any of our markets is supplied even in part by foreign labor, our miners will get that much less work here.

COPPER.

Copper pays a duty of 5 cents per pound, yielding the past year $436,363. Our mines are inexhaustible, and the revenue from duty on copper is so much clear gain to the Treasury. From 1857 to 1861 copper was admitted free of duty. The Treasury got no revenue from it, and the prices of copper in our markets were higher than they are to-day.

FISH—CANADIAN FISHERMEN WANT OUR MARKETS.

Before the 1st of July, 1873, foreign fish were subject to duty. I find that the importation of herring for the year ending June 30, 1873, was 63,497 barrels, duty $1 a barrel, yielding $63,497. Mackerel paid a duty of $2 per barrel, and yielded $141,302 revenue. The duty on salmon was $3 per barrel, and the duty on other fish was $1.50 per barrel. The total duty realized on fish imported was $251,008. This amount of money swelled the coffers of the Treasury, and prior to the 1st of July last was paid by foreign fishermen for the privilege of selling their fish in our markets. Unfortunately by the treaty of Washington this duty on all fish the product of the sea was removed on the 1st of July last; and from that time the Canadian fisherman sells his fish in our ports, and sails home with that price in his pocket. Prior to that time he was required to pay duties at the custom-house before he could get a permit to sell; therefore by the treaty of Washington the Treasury will lose at least $250,000 per annum, and the American fisherman on the sea-coast will suffer the annoyance and the inconvenience of an excessive supply of Canadian fish in his market, to his serious injury and loss. With reference to the price of fish I will here refer, in order to make the case plain, to the New York Mercantile Journal of June 26, 1873, which quotes the various descriptions of fish in that market; and the same journal, on the 3d of July, which was after the treaty took effect, quotes mackerel and other kinds of fish at the same prices. By this it will be seen that the removal of the duties from fish, which took effect on the 1st of July, 1873, had no effect on the prices, and that by the repeal of the duties on foreign fish we reduced the revenues of our Treasury, and gave more money to the foreigners who bring fish to sell in our markets; and on this account last July the fires of joy lit up the evening skies on the Bay of Chaleur and all along the Canadian coasts. Happily the fish of our lakes and rivers were not embraced in the article in relation to fish in the treaty of Washington; but by a recent act of Congress the duties on fresh white-fish and fish for bait were repealed. You will find, sir, by referring to my bill, that I have not omitted to include fish of all kinds, making the duty ¼ cent per pound after the 1st of July next. I think our people prefer to fish as well as cut bait for supplying our markets with fresh fish.

IRON AND IRON WORKERS.

The duty on pig-iron is $7 per ton, less 10 per cent., and the quantity imported last year was 207,000 tons, yielding $1,264,349 revenue. Now the production of pig-iron in the United States is near 3,000,000 tons. The quantity imported, therefore, cannot affect our prices to consumers; but the importation lodges a vast amount of revenue in our Treasury. The iron-ore product of the mines of Michigan last year was over 1,250,000 tons. You will perceive by this that the importation of only 207,000 tons of pig is an insignificant quantity compared with the vast production of our own mines and furnaces. And when the duty on pig-iron was reduced from $9 to $7, which took effect on the 1st of January, 1871, the price of pig-iron in our market continued the same; but the price on the other side of the Atlantic went up $2 per ton. So, in reducing the duty on pig-iron, we took that much money out of the Treasury, amounting in a single year to over $400,000; and that large amount inured to the benefit and profit of foreigners. It stuck to the fingers of the bloated capitalists and monopolists of England.

LUMBER.

The foreign lumber imported during the last fiscal year yielded $1,483,799 revenue. The quantity imported altogether is not equal to the sales in one of our western cities in a single year. Nevertheless, a large revenue is realized from this source; and it might be increased, by advancing the duty, to the benefit of the Treasury and American producers. The value of the annual product of lumber in the United States is estimated to be $1,500,000,000.

THE CHICAGO FIRE AND THE CHICAGO RELIEF ACT.

In 1872 petitions were presented here for the repeal of duties on building material, and at that time many ignorant persons had a notion that our supply of building material was largely drawn from foreign countries; and soon after the Chicago fire Congress provided that in rebuilding that city a drawback should be granted to the extent of the duty on all imported building material.

And, sir, what was the result of that generous act? Now, deducting the plate-glass, the total amount of drawback realized by the people of Chicago on all imported material was only $46,869—not so much as the expense of the two Houses of Congress for the time consumed in the consideration of the measure. It was called the "Chicago relief bill," and no doubt many persons supposed this act of Congress would aid that fire-stricken city to the extent of many millions of dollars. And, sir, I only refer to this for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that American producers furnish more than nineteen-twentieths of the commodities required to supply all domestic demands in the United States.

DOMESTIC PRODUCTIONS IN GENERAL USE.

You might travel, sir, for months through our factories and upon our farms without seeing a single tool or implement of foreign make, and you will rarely if ever find any of the imported fabrics or fineries in the homes of our industrious people; you will find the productions of American looms and American factories in common use all over the United States.

AMERICAN FREE-TRADERS—BRITISH BODKINS.

But, sir, we have a few British bodkins in America, and you have heard our free-trade orators dilate on the advantage to workingmen of a residence in Europe; and although they admit that the wages of labor are less than one-half the compensation realized in this country, yet they say the laborer with the wages in Europe can buy more tools and blankets than he can obtain here for the same money.

The point might be good if the laborer had no food to buy, if he could live on air or free-trade sentiment; but inasmuch as a chest of tools or a pair of blankets will last half a century, the laborer is not required very often to buy such things. His daily necessities for food require the largest part of his earnings, and therefore this central idea in the free-trade argument disappears like the fiction of a dream. Aside from the daily cost of food, the expenditures for other necessaries of life are only occasional and comparatively insignificant.

Why, sir, I have blankets that cover my own children that were woven by my grandmother, and they are better to-day than the blankets produced in the shoddy factories of England.

THE COST OF FOOD THE CHIEF EXPENSE OF LIVING—THE SUPERIOR CONDITION OF AMERICAN WORKINGMEN—IMMIGRATION.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in point of fact, over seven-eighths of the total expenditures for living of a large majority of the American people are required for subsistence alone, and as food is cheaper here than in any country of Europe, even admitting, for illustration, that the price of some manufactured articles is higher in this country at the present time, yet the workingman, realizing double compensation for his labor, can afford to pay higher prices for the remaining one-eighth part of his disbursements, and make money by emigrating to the United States. And, sir, I think the intelligent and practical laboring people of Europe understand this matter far better than our theoretical political economists of the free-trade school; for during the past year about four hundred thousand emigrants have arrived here from Great Britain and the continent of Europe—those countries where the workingman has limited opportunities for improving his condition, and few chances for lifting himself out of the bondage of poverty; a condition of dependence which differs only in name from chattel slavery.

SALT—FREE LABOR VS. SLAVES AND PAUPERS.

The revenue derived from imported salt in 1872 was $1,083,505. But on the 1st of August, 1872, a reduction of about 33 per cent. was made in the duty, resulting in a large reduction in the revenue from this source during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, being only $742,395. This reduction gave great satisfaction, and occasioned great rejoicing in foreign countries. It should be borne in mind that salt may be found in nearly every State in the Union. The material from which it is produced is not considered of any value, and a barrel of salt as seen in our markets is nothing more nor less than a barrel of labor. I can take you to the State of Michigan, where salt is found in great abundance, and the people there will give you acres of land if you will only establish salt works. In Louisiana I saw pure, solid rock-salt in inexhaustible quantity. Nearly all the States of the West produce salt, and the supply for the American market should be obtained from our own country. We now produce more than three-fourths of all the salt we consume, and as the price of salt is fixed by the law of supply and demand, the foreigner gets the American price after deducting the duties required to be paid.

WE HAVE NO STATUTES OR TREATIES FIXING PRICES—THEY ARE FIXED BY THE NATURAL LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND.

As I said before, there are no laws fixing prices. The prices of commodities are as changeable as the sands of the sea. If we remit the duty, the foreigner would get that much more for his salt. Although a large reduction occurred on the 1st of August, 1872, yet, as will be seen by the report of the Bureau of Statistics, the prices of salt in our markets were not affected thereby. It is interesting to notice the changes that have occurred in the production of American salt since the great tariff act of 1862. The importation of salt for 1860 was 14,000,000 bushels, yielding only $214,000 revenue. This was under a free-trade or "revenue-reform" tariff. In 1871, under the highest rates of duty, the importation was only about 9,000,000, but yielding $1,176,587 revenue. The quantity was 5,000,000 less than the importation under the free-trade tariff above mentioned; yet under the protective tariff we obtained over $900,000 more revenue. It is interesting also to note that since 1860 we have more than doubled the production of salt in this country, and in this single industry employment is given to over 50,000 men. Before the tariff act of 1861 our manufactures were unable to supply the markets of the sea-board with a single bushel; but in 1871 over 2,000,000 bushels of domestic salt was sold in the city of New York. The $1,176,587 in gold which foreigners, in 1871, were required to pay into the Treasury for the privilege of selling their salt in our markets causes the shoes of foreign producers to pinch, and the Spaniard driving his slaves and the Englishmen working paupers in Liverpool are anxious that the tariff should be repealed. I am not surprised that they hire people to come over here to give us good advice, and try to produce a change in our tariff laws to suit themselves, under the name of "revenue reform."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed and conclude his remarks, for he is certainly instructing us very handsomely.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. FIELD. Now I take the ground that salt is not affected in price by the quantity imported. Ohio alone produces over 8,000,000 bushels of salt, and Michigan produces not less; and prices to-day in our markets are less than they were in 1860, when we imported nearly all we consumed in the United States, and when we were entirely dependent on foreigners for our supply.

WOOL AND THE RIGHTS OF OUR WOOL-GROWERS.

The duty on raw wool and manufactures of wool for the last fiscal year was $38,496,628. The duty on wool is about ten cents per pound. The quantity of wool imported does not materially affect prices in our markets, as our farmers produce over 177,000,000 pounds. And if the half-naked herdsmen of South America wish to compete with our farmers in selling wool in our markets we only require them to walk up and settle the regular duty at the custom-house. The duty comes out of the foreign producer, the people of La Plata and Buenos Ayres, and other places, who wish to sell their wool in the American markets.

Should the duty be repealed the effect would be to crush our own wool-growers, for the influx of foreign wool would glut and spoil our home markets, and the home market is the chief if not the only support to the wool-grower as well as labor in any other department of industry.

OTHER MANUFACTURES IMPORTED YIELDING A LARGE REVENUE.

The value of wools and woolen goods imported during the past fiscal year was $72,692,742, yielding $38,490,628 revenue; the value of iron and steel goods was $57,333,157, yielding $18,237,388 revenue; and the value of cotton manufactures was $31,810,680, yielding $11,557,173 revenue; the value of leather was $11,812,147, yielding $3,734,828 revenue; the value of flax goods was $21,724,807, yielding $7,212,791 revenue; the value of hemp goods was $7,862,444, yielding $1,648,089 revenue; the value of lead goods was $3,413,393, yielding $1,365,848 revenue. The aggregate revenue derived from the above eight classes of commodities was $82,246,752. As I have already shown with reference to other staples, so, in like manner, the foreign producer of these goods pays the duty required by the tariff into the Treasury of the United States. If we remit these duties, or any part of the duty, we shall lodge the amount in the hands of the foreign producer, making a heavy loss to our Treasury, and doing our workingmen an irreparable injury. We possess the raw material, the machinery, and the artisans capable of producing all these commodities, and when we allow foreigners to bring their goods into our markets it is right and proper that we should levy protective duties upon them for the encouragement of our home manufactures, and for the purpose of enlarging and diversifying our industries.

THE SHOEMAKERS OF NEW ENGLAND.

Some short-sighted shoemakers in New England want the duties on leather repealed. They are so blind that they do not see that the price of leather would not be reduced by a reduction of the duties, and they forget that for fifty years a duty of $1.50 was levied on every pair of boots imported into the United States. Under protection, and by the aid of skill and machinery, their industries have reached a point of perfection to defy foreign competition. Prices have been so reduced by domestic competition that even without a tariff foreigners could not sell much of their work in our markets; but notwithstanding this historical tariff fact before them, we now hear these shoemakers raising their voices against our tanners. They want to kill off our tanners for the temporary benefit which they imagine would accrue to them. They forget that by striking down even one home industry so great as that of the leather manufacturers would cripple all others, and paralyze and destroy the prosperity of the country, and consequently the shoemakers would suffer as well as all others by the general calamity.

THE DESTRUCTION OF INDUSTRY THE DESTRUCTION OF WEALTH.

You remember, sir, the destruction of the city of Chicago by fire. It was a national calamity, on account of the vast destruction of wealth, and the injurious effects of the great loss were felt far and near; but sir, this calamity, affecting as it did so many thousands of our people, was a mere bagatelle compared to the destruction of a great home industry, producing in a single year more than twenty times the wealth that was destroyed when Chicago burned. The shoemakers should understand that the industries are dependent; their interests are mutual, and an injury to one is quickly felt by another. If you saw off a man's leg the whole body is injured and its successful working impaired; and so it is with the whole body or association of industries, the co-operation of each is essential to the well-being of all. They should remember that the permanent success of one industry is only assured by the prosperity of all. All efforts, therefore, on the part of one trade or industry to assail and injure another are supremely mean and selfish.

A SELFISH DISPOSITION.

I have, Mr. Speaker, some fine Essex pigs on my farm; they are undoubtedly as well-bred as pigs can be, but I have often seen one pig try to root another out of the trough. So it is with the consumers of leather, and the consumers of steel, in fighting the leather and steel manufactures of the United States. They display a disposition of hoggish meanness, only deserving the contempt and disgust of all fair-minded men. The New England shoemakers have enjoyed the blessing of protection for more than half a century. If all manufacturing industries shall continue to be protected in this country for half that time, we shall see a greater number of industries established on the fertile prairies of the West than we now find in operation on the sterile rocks of New England; for "westward the course of empire takes its way;" and the industries, the graceful companions of our civilization, are now taking their congenial and profitable places in all the villages and cities of the West.

INDEPENDENCE FOR THE MASSES—RESERVE THE NATIONAL MARKETS TO THE NATIONAL LABOR.

This Government was organized in behalf of independent labor. It is a workingmen's country, and they control and regulate its affairs by the ballot; and the question returns, shall we legislate here to benefit and bless the American people, or for the benefit and for the advantage of foreign nations? The country is ours, the markets of the country belong to us, and the people have a right to demand of their representatives here that the markets of the country shall be reserved for the benefit of the American people. I do not fail, however, to consider that the Treasury of the Government requires revenue, and, notwithstanding it is great injury to our labor to tolerate the importation of manufactures which we have the ability to produce here, we are willing to submit to this injury and to this damage in order to secure to the Treasury the means of carrying on the Government. If the Treasury required no revenue from such sources I should insist upon it as a representative of the American people that not a dollar's worth of imported manufactures which we have the ability to produce here should be admitted into the country. On all products which we cannot successfully and conveniently produce we are willing they should be admitted free; but on all other products the rights and the interests of the American people require that if we allow them to enter at all we should require protective duties, and by so doing encourage home industry, secure to our people a diversity of pursuits and abundance of employments, which will enable them to secure better rewards for toil, and lift them out of a condition of helplessness to that of independence and wealth. The workingman has labor to sell; it is his capital and dependence for support, and whoever proposes to destroy his employment, reduce his work, or cut down his wages must be looked upon as an enemy to his vital interests.

LABOR IS WEALTH; WHEN IN EXERCISE GAIN; WHEN UNEMPLOYED A DREADFUL LOSS.

Labor, too, is the only source of wealth. And when the labor of our country is in full exercise the accumulations are very great. But on the other hand every day's work lost is a dead loss to the workingman. Every idle day is a loss which he can never recover, and a loss of fifty-three days' work by the workers of America would be a loss equal to the national debt. The debt, too, must be worked out; it cannot be settled by any device or trick, nor by legerdemain; it is a matter of work, and it seems to be a matter of the highest importance to foster, encourage, and stimulate the labor of the nation.

THE FOLLY AND INJUSTICE OF HIRING LABOR IN EUROPE TO DO OUR MECHANICAL WORK WHILE AMERICANS NEED EMPLOYMENT.

The commodities imported during the past fiscal year consisted almost wholly of manufactures which can be successfully produced in the United States. The total amount of imports, as may be seen by the report of the Bureau of Statistics, was $684,633,735. Deducting from this amount the tea, coffee, and some other articles not produced in this country, we find the value of the other products imported to be $484,746,861. These manufactures and productions compete directly with our home labor, as we are producing like commodities in the United States, and to produce that amount furnished employment to at least 1,200,000 hands, embracing the work of over 500 distinct trades and occupations. You will perceive, therefore, that notwithstanding the impediments and restraints of the existing tariff the capitalists and manufacturers of other countries sent over during the past year this vast amount of their mechanical work, consisting mainly of leather, furniture, cigars, machinery, saws, edge-tools, iron and steel manufactures of every description, clothing, cotton and woolen goods, and other goods, all of which ought to be manufactured here at home, as we possess the raw material as well as the skill and machinery to perform the work.

THE FARMER'S QUESTION—THE GREAT OUTLET FOR FOOD.

If all these commodities consumed by our market had been manufactured in the United States, over 1,200,000 hands would have been employed here, to the manifest advantage of our workingmen, increasing the demands for labor, and securing a better, near-by market to the farmer.

But I desire now to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that this large number of laborers consumed more food than our total exports of breadstuffs and provisions to foreign countries during the same time. And if this large number were engaged in factories and workshops in this country, turning out the same mechanical work which we import, they would consume this food in our own country. About 30 per cent. of the value of manufactured commodities may be estimated as the food consumed by the laborers while at work in their production, and I desire the members from the West, and the South, and the Southwest, to consider the importance of seeking this, the greatest of all outlets for their surplus food. We need the factory and the farm to be placed side by side, and thus we shall secure strength and wealth for both. We have had conventions at the West and at the South seeking to provide outlets for food; and I have heard gentlemen make long speeches on the importance of providing foreign outlets for our food. I would have them consider the importance of seeking that greatest of all outlets—the consumers of the food, the men who do our mechanical work in Europe, brought out and lodged near by these farms, and in this way secure to our country a greater degree of happiness, a larger amount of wealth, and thus make the desert and the waste places blossom and bloom as the rose.

Herein may be found a solution in a philosophical and practical mode for the difficult "transportation question"—the bringing of the producer and consumer near together, and thus removing the necessity for the expensive and needless movement to and fro of bulky and heavy commodities.

THE GREAT NEED OF THE WEST AND SOUTH.

The great need of the country to-day in the West and South is a diversity of employments. They require more factories, more mechanical works, and the farmers are beginning to see this. You will find in any county of any of the Western States that the farmers are quite willing to contribute by subscription and by subsidies in establishing factories in their midst. The watch factory at Elgin, Illinois, is a greater benefit to that State than all her trade with a country like France. I have a farm in Iowa; it is good land, as rich in soil as any in that State, and well situated; yet I will give two-thirds of it to any man who will establish a factory near by.

THE FARM AND THE FACTORY CLOSE TOGETHER.

The farmer wants a market not only for wheat and corn, but for all the other products of the soil, the dairy, and the farm; and to secure that condition he must secure a near-by market, and to sustain such a market mechanical manufactures are required. The importance of this question cannot be overestimated, and in its discussion we must bear in mind that over nineteen-twentieths of the people of this country depend on labor for maintenance and happiness. The national Legislature, therefore, should so frame the laws of the country that the dignity and the independence of workingmen may be maintained, and the greatest good to the greatest number assured; for it is for the happiness and prosperity of a majority of the people that this popular Government was organized.

THE IMPORTATION OF FOOD IN MANUFACTURES—THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES THE LARGEST IMPORTERS OF FOOD IN THE WORLD.

I wish to place before our farmers and gardeners the fact that when we import manufactures we import food, as food is one of the largest items in the cost of producing manufactures, and during the past year we have imported more food in that shape than we have ever exported in a single year, and thus the people of the United States, notwithstanding all our boasting, are the largest importers of food in the world. You cannot make goods without men eat bread, and about 30 per cent. of the cost of manufactures is expended for food. In every ton of pig-iron there is at least $11.60 worth of food. The English free-traders want to tickle our vanity, and they say, "The United States is the granary of the world." They wish to make our farmers believe that it would be profitable and well for them to raise grain for shipment to England, losing six bushels in every seven in the cost of transportation, and bring back the same food in the shape of manufactures, together with a much larger amount produced on the farms of Russia, Germany, and England.

OUR FARMERS AND GARDENERS.

Our farmers and gardeners are faithful toilers from early dawn till late at dewy eve. I know their difficulties and vexations at times are great. They often suffer from the injury and devastations of the insect, the drought, the floods, and the frosts; yet they can overcome all these impediments and losses; but should they be compelled also to face the blighting and destroying effects of free trade, they would be forced to abandon the field and throw up their hands in despair. Without customers and without any demand for his products, the farmer would fill up his corn-crib only to see his crop rot; and his cabbages, turnips, and potatoes would waste ungathered for want of a market. He could shovel his grain into the fire, and bake his meat over the burning corn, as we have seen on the western prairies in free-trade times. His old customers, forced out of employment in the workshops, now cultivate the soil too, and both farmer and mechanic languish and fall together.

THE FREE-TRADE SWINDLE AND THE GRANGERS OF THE WEST.

The farmers and gardeners will puncture this bubble, for they must, I think, see through this swindling free-trade scheme at a glance. The mechanics of a single manufacturing city I can name consume more of our farm productions than our foreign customers ever take. Double the number of mechanics in this country to-morrow, and you would double the value of the lands of our farmers and gardeners, and the prices of farm products would bring to them a better reward for their toil. On the other hand, strike down home manufactures, throw the operatives out of employment, let all the mechanical work they are now doing be done in England or elsewhere, and let population fall off, as it would, one-half, what would the gardener's land be worth, and what prices would farm products fetch in a community stricken with paralysis and pauperism?

Why, I ask, is it that the business of farming in the State of New Jersey, or Pennsylvania, or Michigan, is more profitable than in the far-off States of the West? The reason is, that the farm and the factory lie side by side, and the one furnishes a profitable and desirable customer for the other. Let the mechanical work which we are now employing England and other countries to do be performed in the States of the West and of the South, and we shall not have the large surplus of food to be shipped to the other end of the world in search of a market.

MONOPOLIES IN GENERAL AND PARTICULAR.

I have heard some gentlemen remark that by imposing taxation on the products of foreign labor we encourage monopolies in this country; but I fail to see how monopolies are built up in this way, as there are no restrictions to labor, and I know of no industrial monopoly in our country. The channels of labor and trade are open and free to all; a fair field and no favor is the practice everywhere. The success of one man stimulates others to embark in the same industry, and every additional factory and workshop increases the demand for labor, and the pleasant sounds of industry will soon be heard in every village and hamlet of the country. It might be said with as much reason that one man monopolizes the air because he may be able to breathe more of the air than another. So it is with music or anything else; one man may appreciate and enjoy more than another, but there is no monopoly. All have the right to embark in industrial enterprises in this country, and the tariff taxation on foreign products only prevents our industries being swept away; it prevents raids upon our markets, and has a tendency to secure to our own industries stability and the support of the home markets of our country.

THE PEOPLE'S MONOPOLY OF AMERICAN WORK.

Mr. Speaker, I have always been opposed, and I am to-day opposed, to all monopolies save one. I am opposed to the national banking monopoly, because it is a benefit to a few; and I am opposed to other monopolies which have been created by legislation, and which are injurious to the best interests of the country. But, sir, there is one monopoly which I favor, and which I stand here to defend and sustain, and that is the people's monopoly of American work. I hope to see the day when the American people may be able to monopolize the whole labor of our great country. This monopoly will benefit the toiling millions, for over nineteen-twentieths of our population are laboring people. And, sir, as we are here to legislate for the greatest good to the greatest number, I think no one will assert that we fail to do our duty if we, by tariff legislation, encourage the industries of our own country, and secure to the workingmen and the workingwomen of the land, so far as possible, the complete monopoly of the nation's labor. English statesmen are statesmen for England; they watch and guard well the interests of British subjects. May God raise up in our own country statesmen who shall be statesmen for America. Let us guard well the interests of our own people; other nations may guard and care for their own.

THE HOME MARKET A BOON TO PRODUCERS—IMPORTING MECHANICAL WORK GLUTS OUR MARKET AND ROBS OUR PEOPLE OF THEIR LABOR.

It is the markets of the country that sustain labor, they are the priceless boon of our producers; and when these markets become glutted and overstocked the wheels of our machinery begin to move more slowly; and when the market utterly fails the work stops, and the employer and employé go out of the factory together. Destroy our home markets and you knock the bottom out of domestic employments.

> You take my house, when you do take the prop
> That doth sustain my house: you take my life,
> When you do take the means whereby I live.

The markets of our country require a certain supply of products to meet all demands, and if we allow foreigners to supply those markets one-half, then our own people can only do the other half of the work. Every day's work of imported manufactures practically robs our people of that amount of labor. Therefore the more we protect them and shield our markets from foreign invasion, the more we sustain labor here and secure prosperity for our beloved country.

CIGARS.

Now, a few years ago we had free trade in cigars, and at that time the Spaniards, driving slaves in Cuba, made our cigars, and the cigar factory was almost unknown in this country; but under the protective tariff of 1862 this industry has been shielded as against the work of slaves, and cigar factories may be found to-day in every village and every city of the country. In my district the cigar-makers consume the food produced on the farms of many townships around Detroit. Here is the solution of the statement that a gardener near a great market can lay up more money off five acres than the farmer in Iowa, situated hundreds of miles from market, can accumulate on five hundred acres.

OUR UNEQUALED FACILITIES FOR MANUFACTURERS—RAW MATERIAL AND OTHER ADVANTAGES.

We have heard it said that some countries have natural advantages, and that they have extraordinary facilities for the production of manufactures. But with reference to the United States, we have a variety of soils, varied climate, and raw materials—all those conditions required to sustain the life and independence of a great nation. We possess unequaled facilities for the production of all those commodities which civilized life requires; and the only question which remains is, shall the American people do their own work? Is it wise for us to hire foreigners to do our mechanical work, and grab this labor out of the hands of our own people; or is it not wiser and more statesmanlike for us to stand by our countrymen, and give to them the labor required to supply the needs of our countrymen for every description of work?

BUY WHERE YOU CAN BUY THE CHEAPEST.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard gentlemen say that it is desirable for people to buy where they can buy cheapest. I would have our people buy where they can buy cheapest in our own country. And with reference to foreign countries, my notion is that in buying our mechanical work abroad, no matter what the price may be, it is dear. If we are to hire people in foreign countries to do our work, I say it is not cheap; on the contrary, it is dear. We pay dearly for what we buy abroad, because we rob our own countrymen of that amount of labor and we send away the treasure to pay the mechanics doing the work there. Domestic competition is the best leveler of prices, and if they are to be reduced let the reduction come, not by excessive importations of the products of foreign labor, nor by cutting down wages in the United States, but rather let it come by improved mechanism, new methods, new inventions, and new processes in manufacture by the aid of science and the employment of machinery. This is a "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people;" and Congress is like the head of a family with 40,000,000 children; and it is our duty and our interest to give the work of our country to the children of the country. No other country possesses superior facilities to ours; and our artisans and mechanics can do as much work, if not more, in a day than foreigners.

NOT CHEAP TO HIRE PEOPLE IN EUROPE TO DO OUR MECHANICAL WORK—A PLOT TO ROB US OF OUR MECHANICAL WORK.

If we are to go to Europe; if we are to be dependent, and beg to have our work done there, sir, you may think it is cheap, but it is a dear and exhaustive operation, and will cost more in the long run than you have calculated. England has been able for many years to pit her skill and machinery against our raw materials and rude labor. She wishes us to get out red cedar logs for shipment to England, and buy back lead-pencils. She will buy our corn and give us back poplins; she will take our rags and give us back embossed paper; she will take our square timber and give us back silk stockings and spool thread; she will take our raw cotton and give us back thimbles and hair-pins; she will take our bones and send back superphosphates; she will take our tar and turpentine and give us gravy and plum pudding; she will take our "whole skins for a sixpence and sell us back the tails for a shilling." Such trade is exhaustive and weakening. It secures to them the "workshops of the world," and to us that other rude work fit only for barbarians and slaves, the raising of raw products for distant and unfavorable markets. England is the great blood-sucker of the world; she has sucked the very life out of Ireland, Turkey, India, Spain, and Canada, and now she proposes to draw upon the United States. But the plot to rob us of our mechanical work will be exposed, and a brave, intelligent, and free people will spring to their feet in defense of their industries, as they would in defense of the flag should foreign foes invade our soil. We shall resist at all hazards every effort of British hirelings to befog and beguile the people of this country with their free-trade heresies.

RUDE WORK VS. MECHANICAL WORK—BARBARISM VS. CIVILIZATION.

If we are to do rude work, which is labor begging at forty or sixty cents per day, England will do the mechanical work, and thus employ her artisans and mechanics. If our work is to be done in England, what are we to do here? Are we to be ornamental figure-heads and wall-flowers, raise our crops, and build large poor-houses? God forbid.

EXPORTING RAW PRODUCTS—IMPORTING MECHANICAL AND MACHINERY WORK.

Mr. Speaker, if you examine the tables reported by the Bureau of Statistics, you will find that while 76 per cent. of our imports consist of mechanical work our exports consist almost wholly of raw products, and 80 per cent. of the value of the products exported last year you will find to consist of raw cotton, food, and gold. The value of raw cotton exported was $225,000,000. Now I would change this trade, and instead of exporting so much raw cotton I would reduce it to yarn, thereby doubling its value, and I would sell cotton yarn to foreigners at double the price of raw cotton, the difference being the value of the labor employed for the purpose. Instead of shipping one bale of raw cotton and bringing back three bales in the shape of cotton stockings and spool thread, I would work up the raw cotton on the spot and sell the manufactures of cotton, and thus augment home productions. In this way I would rehabilitate the South and furnish employment to its surplus labor, to the manifest advantage and profit of the great cotton States.

THE EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM.

I have wished for many years to see labor elevated in my country, by securing greater demands for labor, and thus bestow upon laboring men the power to fix better terms, better rewards for toil, greater independence, greater wealth, greater freedom, and less hours for toil. And I hope to see the day when, by a diversification of our pursuits and an increased demand for labor in our country, our intelligent mechanics may be able to secure such compensation for their toil as will enable them to support themselves and their families on eight hours' work. But that day cannot be hastened by giving the nation's work to the people of other countries, for labor is subject to the law of supply and demand. You cannot make the Detroit River flow up stream, nor can you put up the price of wages by a vote of the union if there be no demand for labor to justify and sustain it. The more work we have to do in this country the more demand will be raised for labor here, and the greater ability on the part of the workingman to make better terms and better prices for his toil.

CONCLUSION—PROTECTION BENEFICENT, ASSURING WEALTH AND FREEDOM TO MAN.

I take the ground that the American people are entitled to a preferential chance in their own markets; and is it not just that the people who own the country and work to build it up should enjoy the benefits of the markets which their industry and enterprise alone have created? If foreigners want access to our ports for the sale of their manufactures, let us require toll of them in the shape of protective duties, or let them come here with their capital and machinery, build factories, furnish employment to our people, and pay American wages. A protective tariff restrains and checks importation, prevents certain raids upon our markets, and when the European manufacturers find that they cannot dispose of their goods without the payment of duties they will come to the United States with their capital, and pay taxes to support our schools, as we have always done. And this tendency has been exhibited in the fact that during the past twelve years thousands have arrived and put up great workshops and factories in the United States. There is, therefore, no hidden mystery about the tariff question; it is a question of dollars and cents; it is a question of labor, a just reward for labor, and independence for the masses. It favors domestic competition as against foreign monopoly; it is opposed to a reduction of labor at home, which always leads to idleness, pauperism, and crime. Protection, in short, secures to the people of this country universal prosperity, a prosperity which falls like the dews of heaven, a good to all and an injury to none. I therefore favor, Mr. Speaker, that system of national exchanges which will put more revenue into the Treasury of our Government and more labor into the hands of the American people.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, sincerely believing that the country is threatened with the enactment of financial measures that will endanger its prosperity, that will bring about far worse evils than those from which we are attempting to escape, I deem it my duty to attempt to present some suggestions upon the subject of currency and finance. It seems to me that at this time there is no subject of graver import than the currency. It involves the entire progress of civilization, of national and individual prosperity, the profitable employment of labor, the value of property, and the advancement of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce; and especially does it involve the question of taxation. In the opinion of Burke:

"The revenue of the state is the state; in effect all depends upon it, whether for support or for information." "The revenue, which is the spring of all, becomes, in its administration, the sphere of every active virtue." "Through the revenue alone the body-politic can act in its true genius and character; and therefore it will display just as much of its collective virtue as it is possessed of a just revenue."

I need not say that the subject before us is one demanding our most careful attention. Indeed, it is scarcely possible to overstate its importance. As stated in the report of the Senate Committee on Finance in December, 1867:

Next to the existence of the Government itself and the security of personal rights come the protection of property, the preservation of the public credit, the adjustment of taxes, and the regulation of the currency. Nearly all the legislation of peace is the legislation of finance. The action of Congress on these subjects affects the value of all property in the United States, the reward of all labor, the income of the rich, the wages of the poor, the pension of the widow, the enterprise and industry of all our people, and thus touches the home and heart of every person in the United States. And it should be the effort of Congress to adopt a comprehensive policy that will preserve the public faith, restore confidence to the people, stability to our business interests, and yet will appeal to the sense of justice of our constituents if it is unhappily drawn into the arena of party politics.

I have read and heard numerous attacks on the plan proposed for a national currency, but they have been confined to declamation and denunciation. In no case have objections risen to the dignity of arguments, or entitled themselves to the rank of appeals to reason. Not a single attack has been made in which a formidable objection has been raised. As so much can be urged in favor of a uniform and exclusively national currency, and so little worthy of serious consideration can be said against it, I feel the more emboldened to continue my advocacy of the principles underlying the bill to provide the money of the United States, and regulate the value thereof, convinced as I am that discussion cannot fail to produce new converts to the cause of truth. No attack yet made on this system has appeared to me in the least formidable; and its adversaries by their course would seem to allow it to be unassailable by reason and argument. It is easy to assert that the principles which the bill is intended to carry out are the wild dreams of speculative theorists; indeed much easier than to point out their probable variance in practice with the best interests of the country.

I may be permitted to say at the outset that I should have felt it almost as impossible to avoid coming to the conclusions to which I have been led on this subject as to refuse my assent to the demonstration of any problem in mathematics. And it may not be altogether out of place, perhaps, for me to here confess that more than a year ago I set about obtaining material for an argument to sustain the theory I had never questioned, that a specie basis was absolutely essential to a sound currency. I found that the only practical effect of the check of a so-called specie basis would be to place the national credit at the mercy of panic, and that, so far as the old State banks were concerned, we never could rely upon the specie-promise basis as a perfect, steady, uniform, and adequate check against any excess in the issues of their notes. My investigations showed me that I had before been in error. And though it is sometimes regarded as humiliating to confess to a change of one's opinions on a subject, there is still left the satisfaction that it is but an acknowledgment that one is wiser to-day than he was yesterday. Discovering my error was like discovering an error in an axiom, which, says Bolingbroke, is "like breaking a charm. The enchanted castle, the mirage, disappears, and where artifice or mist deceived, the path is opened and the inquirer finds his way." And may we not hope that the time will soon arrive when we shall no longer have reason to exclaim, "How impotent the endeavor to persuade men that wealth and property are all fictitious unless moved upon a golden medium?"

This is a contest where the representatives of the moneyed aristocracy on the one hand are arrayed against the representatives of the general public, the masses of the people, on the other. This bill proposes a financial system established on simple, just, constitutional principles. It involves questions which affect in their practical consequences the interests and the comforts of every citizen of the Republic.

This Congress has the option of employing its brains and intelligence in the creation of a currency which shall be cheap and good, and its benefits inure equally to every citizen of the Republic, or it may continue a costly and comparatively poor currency which benefits the few at the expense of the many, and thereby violates the principle of equality—the basilar idea on which true republican institutions and legislation are founded.

Why not adopt the simple and symmetrical, and eminently safe and prudent system proposed by the bill I have advocated, so that all the profits of the creation of money shall go to the lessening of taxation; that shall be exclusively the money of the people, for the people, and by the people? I repeat, let the profits of the issue of currency be enjoyed by the people, the only parties who can show a title to them.

Most of the currency bills to which my attention has been called, proposed to the House, are directly, as it seems to me, in the interest of the bank monopoly. They are calculated to aggravate the evils of the present system, and to transfer money from the pockets of the people to the purses of the managers of bank monopolies. To put our currency in the managment of the banks is to establish a system of legalized oppression.

Says Jefferson—

The bank mania is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the Government at defiance; and although forced to yield a little on the first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. They have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn, and the sop to Cerberus from fable has become history. Their principles take hold of the good, their pelf of the bad, and thus those that the Constitution has placed as guards at its portals are sophisticated or suborned from their duties.

It may be remarked that the bullionists are our most recent oracles; indeed they are dogmatic and oracular, or nothing; and generally in their mode of enforcing their notions remind one of the alchemist Albertus Magnus, who "taught an art without art, whose principles were errors, and whose eloquence was delusion." And while I have been as much surprised as gratified at the cordial reception and acceptance this, to some extent, new departure in finance has had accorded to it in influential quarters, in others I have been forcibly reminded of Huskisson's observation on the slowness and reluctance of individuals, otherwise of observing minds and excellent understanding, in calling in question and examining the truth of early impressions, adopted upon authority and followed from usage. This tardiness is naturally increased when interest is manifestly on the side of the existing system.

It has been well said that "it was not a matter of choice, but of necessity, that men fell into the use of a substitute for coin. The capabilities of trade increased, and a medium for that trade must have been discovered, or civilization itself must have stood still. This adoption of credit commenced by supplying that to which the existing medium was inadequate, and ended by showing that the necessity for any other existed but in the imagination of the theorist, or the ignorance of the learned. Thus it is not by speculation on the abuse, but by observation on the use of credit that we learn its real value. Originating in necessity, there was no alternative. The first cause has ceased to operate, but it has left a state of things which no earthly power can control; and to attempt to bring back trade to a state restricted by the physical presence of a given supply of gold is as foolish as to attempt to stop the very course of nature." "Experience has demonstrated that paper currency, the material of which possesses no intrinsic value, executes the intention of money more completely than even metal currency itself. There is therefore no necessary connection between money and an intrinsic value of material. It is sufficient that it be of admitted value, whether that be intrinsic or imposed."

And I beg here to make a brief citation from the great author on political economy, McCulloch:

A currency would be in its most perfect state if it consisted wholly of paper money of the same value of gold and silver. It is impossible, however, to attain to this degree of perfection so long as paper is made convertible into coin, as such convertibility renders paper of the same value as metallic money, but it is defective inasmuch as it does not banish the latter from circulation, and does not save, therefore, the whole expense of a metallic currency.

The great financial writer, Thomas Atwood, says with great force and clearness of illustration:

Contrast all the dangers, the changes, the fluctuations, the unjust ruin, the unjust aggrandizement attendant upon a metallic standard, with the security, the certainty, the equality of prices and of values, the exemption from unjust losses and from unjust gains, and the general stability of all profits and of all prosperity which a non-convertible paper currency presents—self-existent, self-dependent, liable to no foreign actions, entirely under our own control; contracting, expanding, or remaining fixed according as the wants and exigencies of the community may require—a non-convertible paper currency presents every element of national security and happiness without the possibility of injuring any one class of the community. * * * By it we may forever insure a wholesome range of prices, neither too high nor too low, but securing at all times the due reward of industry to the productive classes and the due distribution of mutual rights and interests among all other classes of the community. I have reflected upon the subject for twenty years; I have continually turned it in my mind in a thousand shapes and ways, and I still most firmly retain the opinion above expressed; and one important fact I ought to mention in confirmation of this opinion: I have never met one single individual who has had leisure and disposition to turn his thoughts to the subject who has not fully adopted the same opinion in the end. * * * If these arguments are wrong, is it not strange that no one has ever been found to point out their error? All the experience that we have had in Great Britain confirms their truth. Every shock that our circulating system has sustained from the year 1791 to this day can be directly traced to the pressure of the metallic standard. In 1816 and 1819 the very foundations of society were giving way. In 1825 the whole circulating system was suddenly falling upon our heads. In every instance the paper saved us; and nothing but the paper.

Sir John Sinclair wrote in 1825:

Scotland, with a barren soil and a wretched climate, is at the present moment the most prosperous country in Europe, and its prosperity is entirely founded on a paper currency; for there is not a single sovereign or guinea to be found in its common circulation.

A paper currency issued by a government in full credit is preferable to specie, (and for this compendious statement I am mainly indebted to Thomas Law, esq.:)

1. Because the former can be regulated so as to always bear a proper proportion to the industry and property of a nation, whereas the latter, being an article of commerce, fluctuates in quantity.

2. Because the precious metals disappear, being hoarded or exported in times of difficulty when most required, whereas the paper money always remains.

3. Because, as the value of fixed capital and the interest of money depends upon the quantity of money, it is requisite to have a sufficient quantity without excess.

4. Because paper money is more cheaply and rapidly transmitted from one quarter of the country to another than specie.

5. Because by this facility of remittance it lowers the rate of internal exchange.

6. Because paper money permits the exportation of bullion and specie for advantageous mercantile transactions, without any derangement of home trade and interchange of labor for money.

7. Because paper money increases manufactures and improvements, and exports bring back specie.

We find ourselves placed in the focus of civilization, with a territory having numerous and fine sea-ports, with great inland seas, and intersected by magnificent rivers, with every variety of climate and a productive soil, and enriched by varied and abundant minerals adapted to the wants of mankind. And there seems no definite term to the course of prosperity open before us. And we are also fortunate in a system of government and laws which is calculated to afford protection to property, admits of no degrading distinctions, encourages industry, fosters genius, and excites emulation, and is supported by the moral, manly, enterprising, and national character of our people.

While other generations have employed romance in their argument, and the wildest imagining in their inference, we have been able to see that with the position and resources of this country at this instant, and with its now-established political power and recognized military and financial ability, nothing is necessary but united spirit, wise direction, and continued energy, to develop all latent strength, increase all instant profit, and move the whole nation forward as one body straight to the highest and most glorious and useful position.

In this great commercial nation we must have a system of circulation which maintains the value of money, and by its permanency secures the substantial justice and faith of moneyed contracts and obligations between man and man. May we be permitted to hope that a plan which is designed to accomplish this result—by providing a currency of which the standard is invariable, and in the use of which the utmost economy is practiced—may be approved by the wisdom of Congress? And the country is to be congratulated that this is not a party question, and that the House on this subject occupies a position—

Where none is for a party,
Where all are for the state.

And now, turning more immediately to our subject, I may say, in passing, it seems to me that two of the principal causes of the difficulty in obtaining cash last fall, which resulted in the panic, were, first, an excess in the creation of credits, by which dealers lost confidence in each other, and thereby became disinclined to deal on credit; and, secondly, a great harvest at the West, to pay for which an unusually large amount of currency was required.

No one has written, so far as I know, an essay on the thesis of "spontaneous popular ideas." I do not intend to do so. I have often been struck and puzzled by noticing the springing up all over the country, apparently without propagation and certainly with no concert of thought, novel and striking ideas, quite at variance with former notions on the same subject, some of which ideas have soon grown, apparently on the strength of their own merit and soundness, into gradual acceptation, and become adopted into the affairs of men. They seem to have been discoveries, not inventions, and are, if sound, always fundamental in their character. These ideas probably grow by natural sequence out of existing ideas and as a result of them, as all young branches of a tree grow from the next elder growth of branches.

Just now there seems to have cropped out all over the country one of these ideas, to wit, "that a specie basis for circulating notes is not desirable." In other words, convertibility into gold on demand at the option of the holder is not a necessary attribute of a perfect circulating currency medium.

Wendell Phillips, (see New York Times of December 15, 1873,) in his usual very pungent manner, scouts and contemns the absurd, antique notion of a specie basis, And the Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER takes substantially the same ground.

I think, with many others, that our present home currency is much the best we ever had, and I am not at all sure that it is not better than the currency of any other country. I have a notion, not very clearly defined in my own mind, that our financial situation has had and is having a very marked effect upon the prices of labor and all the commodities of commerce in Europe, and that this effect has been and continues to be exceedingly beneficent to us.

Certainly since the war our prosperity has been unexampled in all history or in any country. It is more logical to attribute that prosperity to the system under which it has occurred than to claim that it has occurred in spite of it.

The panic is long over and confidence restored, and with the currency question judiciously settled trade will be lively, and industrial enterprises will be generally resumed, excepting those which were based on mere credit, like the North Pacific, the Midland, the Texas Pacific, and other railroad projects of that ilk.

When the war cloud passed away we entered upon the arts and enterprises of peace, with gold the conventional, if not the indispensable, basis of circulating medium, at say 200 for 100. Prices were inflated. Since that time shrinkage of values has been going on at a constant and pretty uniform rate, until now 112 in gold will purchase as much as 200 would in the beginning.

That the country has borne this and been prosperous proves that we can meet 12 per cent. more shrinkage without feeling it, if it comes in the natural course of trade, and is not interfered with by legislation.

And, perhaps it might be added, labor being the main element in all commodities, its cost fixes the limit of production and of employment. The great point to be attained is that our money shall have a fixed and permanent purchasing power.

The pernicious system of paying, by banks, interest on deposits, denominated in Wall street "call loans," is the chief means of drawing the currency away from the country to the cities, where it is loaned out by the banks to brokers and speculators for speculative operations in stocks and securities, the whole thing being, as everybody knows, real sugar-coated gambling.

We hold that the Federal Government should have the whole and sole control of the currency. The currency proposed rests upon the authority of the state and the confidence of the public. By issuing the currency the nation gains the interest on the amount thrown into circulation. The United States have given an example of a constitution of government made for the many; let us give a financial system also on the same principle, and not sanction an artful plan for a few to prey upon the community. Humanity, justice, patriotism, and economy cry aloud for a currency system which will abolish an unnatural union of government and banks; for this, it is charged, is now the most prolific source of corruption under our Government. Talk about crédit mobilier! What are a few railroad shares compared with the manipulations it is asserted are expected by our statute-makers from their friends or masters, the plethoric money bank managers? Let us hope that we shall not have votes or action obviously dictated by nothing more than a corporation spirit. The banking monopoly ought to be extinguished. Government should keep the power of issuing money in its own hands, and not allow private individuals to interfere with such a power. A national currency will have the good effect of making all its citizens, on account of their interest, zealous for maintaining the Government. Any fear that the credit of our Government is to be destroyed is simply a bugbear with which to frighten children and imbecile old women "of both sexes."

The nation can be supplied with a medium of circulation without expense, instead of being obliged to purchase gold for a basis. Let not the Government make the ruinous and unjust attempt to force upon the country an undue and impracticable metallic standard. Our circumstances prohibit our reliance on an article of commerce liable to be melted, hoarded, and exported, and in a constant state of fluctuation. And it is found that specie basis, like a summer friend, in time of need disappears. Low interest is the life and soul of trade, and interest can only be regulated by a uniform currency. The danger to business interests from the operations of banks being conducted in secret have been vividly portrayed by Calhoun; but I cannot stop to dwell upon them.

The national banks now perform two operations of banking, which are quite distinct and have no necessary connection with each other: they issue a paper currency, and receive deposits and make advances of money in the way of loan to merchants and others. It is obvious that these transactions might be carried on by two separate bodies, without the slightest loss to the country or to the persons who receive accommodation from such loans. Suppose the privilege of issuing paper money were taken away from the banks, and were in future to be exercised by the sovereignty only, in what way would the national wealth be in the least impaired?

Are not the services of the banks in distributing currency most prodigally paid? Are not those wealthy corporations thereby accumulating a treasure with an ease and to an amount without parallel? And all at the expense of the public, and owing to the neglect and forbearance if not the connivance of Congress? Cannot a better and more economical arrangement be made? Can it be doubted that the services which the banks perform in the matter of distributing the circulating medium could be performed, under the system proposed by this bill, by public servants and in public offices, at a reduction or saving (including interest) of say $30,000,000 per annum, or over $500,000 per week? I can see no advantage whatever accruing to the Government for this vast expense. Is it too much to ask of Congress that this drain shall be stopped, and taxation reduced pro rata, or the national debt paid off to that extent? Shall the banks be permitted to longer enjoy all the fruits of so improvident and unequal an arrangement? Is it not lamentable to view the bank monopolists exhibiting a wish to augment their hoards by undue gains wrested from the hands of an overburdened people? Is it not enough that they have already, during a long period, received a subsidy of twenty or thirty millions a year? Is it not high time they relinquished to the state this subsidy for which they make no return whatever? Dry-goods dealers, hardware men, pork-packers, and so on, are just as much entitled to a subsidy from the Government as bankers. What right have the banks to enjoy the profit and use of the public money without allowing the least remuneration therefor? Let them have every facility for carrying on their legitimate business as banks of discount and deposit, and not obtrusively and selfishly demand to issue the people's money, which should be directly and exclusively within the control of the people through the Government. "Paper money," as remarked by Ricardo, "may be considered as affording a seigniorage equal to its whole exchangeable value, and seigniorage in all countries belongs to the state." By becoming the sole fountain of issue of its paper money this nation might secure a net annual revenue in the neighborhood of $30,000,000. The present system involves a taxation so onerous, oppressive, and revolting, that when it comes to be discussed and understood by the people, it will arouse a feeling of disgust and indignation.

Thomas Jefferson, in his letters to Eppes, to be found in volume 6 (page 140) of his works, says:

In the revolutionary war the old Congress and the States issued bills without interest and without taxes. * * * But, though we have so improvidently suffered the field of circulating medium to be filched from us by private individuals, yet I think we may regain it.

And again he says:

Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulation restored to the nation, to whom it belongs.

Are not the words to a considerable extent as applicable as when uttered by Calhoun in Congress, when he said "The evil he desired to remedy was a deep one, almost incurable; because connected with public opinion, over which the banks have great control? They have in great measure a control over the press;" for the proof of which he referred to the fact that the present state of the circulating medium had scarcely been denounced by a single paper in the United States. And in the present year of grace, how many newspapers have the courage of opinion to print the statistics showing the amount of subsidy wrung from the people yearly by the bank monopolists? I think it will be found that the banks substantially own a great many of the so-called organs of public opinion, and that the editors of them wear a bank collar; else why not raise their voice, like sentinels on the watch-tower of freedom, in a cause so manifestly that of the people, and demand a reform which it is as plain as the noonday sun will largely reduce taxation?

We have done away with personal tyranny by the emancipation of a race. But there is now fast-rooted and growing into tremendous proportions the tyranny of monopoly. And the emphatic words of a former president of the Colonization Society in reference to the great evil at that time overshadowing our country in the form of the slavery of a race are to-day applicable to the slavery of the people to corporation monopolies:

Loudly, then, as by an angel's voice, are we called upon to awake, and before age has fixed our habits, and the poison becomes mingled in the fount of life, make those exertions which may secure perpetual strength, purchase immortal glory, and save us from terrors darkening as we advance, which invest the future with clouds of mysterious and tremendous calamity.

I read in utter amazement the speeches delivered at the Cooper Institute, New York, at the meeting on the 24th instant; and witnessing so much folly, ignorance, and fatuity there, I said to myself, where, then, shall we look for wisdom? But on scanning the list of speakers put forward it was evident that the affair was engineered mainly by free-traders, who we all know are working with might and main to promote British doctrines and British interests on this continent; they constitute, indeed, a class of men who, consciously or unconsciously, are the enemies of the country, in that they are the enemies of the American policy advocated by Clay, Webster, Greeley, Carey, Webb, and a long line of earnest patriots. Their aim is to reduce the labor of this country to the European standard. They are men who seem to forget that whoever is in favor of reducing the volume of productive labor in this country wishes to do that which is calculated to enlarge the volume of poverty, hunger, and starvation, of which there is already too much in the world. Mr. Field introduced Mr. Bryant (both leading free-traders) to preside; and Mr. Atkinson, the most venomous of his tribe, made a prominent speech, (and his of all the speeches was the most absurd and monstrous,) which is headed in the Tribune "A lie as a standard of value;" while lesser lights of the same school shed their radiance upon the platform. But this coterie of free-traders were not acute enough to exclude all sensible utterances, and as a sample of sound grains of sense picked from a hurricane of chaff, the remarks of Hon. George Opdyke are worthy of consideration.

He said:

Business men demand of Congress definite knowledge in regard to the volume of our paper currency in the immediate future; for every intelligent business man knows that its contraction will reduce prices and engender panics, and that its expansion will increase prices and stimulate speculation. It is an axiom in political economy that the enlargement of our irredeemable paper currency robs the creditor class, and that its contraction robs the debtor class. This fact has often been demonstrated, but by no one more clearly and forcibly than by our esteemed and venerable friend Peter Cooper, now on this platform. * * * All patriotic citizens who desire to see our country prosperous must condemn both expansion and contraction, for the additional reason that the one would tend to produce panic and wide-spread insolvency, and the other to stimulate wild speculation. It is obvious that there is only one way to avoid the evils incident to both expansion and contraction, namely, to maintain steadfastly the volume of the paper currency at the limits now established by law, and to permit our rapidly increasing internal commerce to grow up to it. This will require but very few years, and then the resumption of specie payments will come naturally and without financial disasters.

This indirect and imperceptible contraction has been in operation ever since the close of the war, at the rate of some $30,000,000 per annum. It has already effaced more than nine-tenths of the gold premium that obtained at the close of the war; and all this has been accomplished during a period of prosperity unexampled in our history.

The policy of firmly maintaining the existing status of our currency my friend, Mr. Low, stigmatizes as the "drifting policy," but surely without any show of reason. To expand or contract the currency may properly be called drifting with the changing tides of popular sentiment; but to remain firmly anchored until the rising tide of commerce will enable your currency to enter safely the harbor of specie payments, is the opposite to drifting at the mercy of the winds and waves. This steadfast policy is, in my judgment, the shortest and quickest way to specie payments. Any attempt to reach that goal sooner, by means of contraction, is sure to destroy confidence, engender financial crisis, paralyze industry, and thus to produce wide-spread insolvency, from which the business of the country will not recover for years. Such was the experience of Great Britain after the premature attempt at resumption in the year 1817, and such the experience of our own country after the crisis of 1837. We need have no fears that Congress will adopt the policy of contraction. * * * There seems to be a strong probability that Congress will in some form authorize a further issue of national-bank notes. This is expansion, unless the notes be made redeemable in gold, as our resolutions propose. This is known to be impracticable in the present condition of our country. * * * In point of stability and all the other attributes of a good currency, I regard greenbacks as the superior of national-bank notes.

And Mr. William Wood, although somewhat confined by the shackles of specie-basis notions, was impelled by the inherent honesty of his own mind—a trait so characteristic of his nationality—to the admission of an important historical fact. He said:

It would ill become me, a native Scotsman, and the son and grandson of Scottish bankers, to say anything against a well-regulated system of paper currency, because in the interval from 1750 to 1874, or in one hundred and twenty-four years, it has mainly contributed to raise Scotland from the depths of extremest poverty to be one of the wealthiest countries of Europe in proportion to its population, and has made its naturally sterile soil to "rejoice and blossom as the rose"—to be literally the best cultivated of all countries.

So much for the great New York meeting.

I have not changed my view that the statu quo is much to be preferred to any plan but that embodied in the bill I had the honor to introduce, with perhaps the exception of the three sixty-five plan davocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] If the fiscal difficulties lately and now experienced have grown out of causes that are now past and buried, the mischiefs now felt will be soonest cured by no legislation at all, unless the plans just referred to are adopted. Contraction will intensify them; expansion will mitigate, but continue them. It will be a mistake to pass any bill which requires resumption of specie payments in any manner at any time certain; and I am certain that I will vote wrong if I vote for any manner of resumption of specie payment, as the term is generally understood. We may by issuing an exclusively national currency of judicious volume, and which shall be received for customs dues, in no long period appreciate our paper currency to a par with gold; and I am in favor of such resumption. But under compulsion of law there can be no resumption of specie payments. The Government can attempt it, and will fail. The resumption of the Government, if successful, would retire the greenbacks, and leave us with bank bills, gold and silver, for currency, and would be a contraction of the volume of currency, say one-fourth, one-third, or one-half; and bank-bills would at once become uncurrent, as it is called, or would be at a discount; demands would be made on the banks amounting to a general run upon them. They could not redeem, as a matter of course, and would be forced into bankruptcy and wound up; and we should witness such a deluge of financial disaster and ruin as has never occurred in any land.

What I have intended to say is, that Congress should do as little meddling as possible with the currency, (if they will not pass the bills referred to,) and at once be done with the subject.

If we may believe the newspapers—and it is safe in thus referring to some of them to use the subjunctive mood—Congress may be assured that the very worst feature of the financial situation now consists in the fact that Congress is still considering it and discussing it. Perhaps it ill becomes me to say it, but I will venture the remark that it is a subject upon which "a few brilliant flashes of silence" would be true eloquence, excepting only the utterance of an emphatic and sonorous "no," upon all bills and proposals (save the two I have indicated) to meddle with the currency. But, seriously, I am glad this important question is being so fully discussed. And Congress and the country are to be congratulated that the conduct of the bill is in the hands of a gentleman who exhibits so eminently liberal and fair a spirit in the matter. Hasty, ill-considered legislation on so important a subject would be inexcusable.

We are tending toward appreciation of paper with gold by the operation of the laws of trade as fast as we can afford. Let well enough alone. Do not change for the sake of change. If we adopt the rule not to vote for legislative changes of our financial laws until we are sure that the proposed change is an improvement, we will not vote for the change proposed by the committee. Should we not oppose alike schemes of inflation and schemes of contraction?

In respect to our monetary system and legislation affecting it, there exists a pregnant evil in the public mind which is likely to mislead the Representatives of the people into mischievous and perhaps disastrous legislation. I refer to the notion that we now have a bad or poor currency. This is a gross mistake. It is true the Government loses a vast sum of money every year by not issuing its money directly to the people instead of indirectly through the banks; but as a circulating medium ours is, and has been since the close of the war, much the best currency ever possessed by the American people, or, as I believe, any other people. Under it we have prospered, grown rich, and been free from panics and revulsions to a degree unprecedented in any other age or country. By the operation of the immutable laws of trade and industry adapting themselves to the laws of Congress creating our circulating medium, we have approached pretty closely to an appreciation of paper with gold. If the law is changed to receive customs dues in greenbacks, and the amount in circulation not increased, they will be at par with gold in a brief period of time.

During the war we coined the credit of the nation into more than four thousand millions of credit capital, or credit money: United States bonds, United States bills, State bonds, county bonds, city bonds, town bonds, and bank bills. The expansion was tremendous. We were or became a vast credit balloon; and rose, and rose accordingly. We are now descending rapidly enough without the aid of Congress; and we must take care not to come down with a rush, lest when we do strike terra firma we may burst up the whole concern.

There has been great shrinkage of values, so that now there is not 12 per cent. between gold, the standard of the world, and greenbacks, the standard of the United States. The laws of production and trade will soon dispose of the 12 per cent. difference, and slide into a state of redemption as soon as the business of the country will stand it, if Congress will but let alone a matter which Congress cannot mend, except, as I believe, by establishing a national currency receivable for public and private dues, excluding only interest on bonds payable by their terms in gold.

Resumption will come silently, quietly, and gloriously, like the dawn of day, when most of the animated world is sound asleep, if we do not disturb the natural and universal laws of currency, production, accumulation, and distribution of wealth, which are, in fact, the laws of God implanted in the nature and impulses of the human family.

Banks are creatures of the Government, and so far as they are authorized to issue currency, the Government is responsible for the consequences of their actions. And if measures could be adopted by which their currency could be retired and greenbacks substituted in its place of equal amount, there would then be no objection to the continuation of the banks and the addition to their number to any extent. Make banking free and place banks on their own resources, and leave the public to deal with them or not, as they do with the manufacturer, and there will be possibly vicissitudes in banking business then, but they will no more concern the public than vicissitudes and disasters of manufacturing enterprises. But the Government is charged with the great constitutional duty of providing money for the people and regulating its value, and can make no excuse to the people if disaster grows out of their permitting that function to be exercised by corporations or individuals. If it is not a great moral wrong for the Government to do it, it is nevertheless a fearful and fatal mistake in policy.

On this point I wish to say that if I understand the bill submitted by the Committee on Banking and Currency (H. R. 1572) it proposes to so amend the banking law that there shall be no limit whatever to the right of banks to coin a paper currency for the use of the people, by filing with the Treasurer of the United States the bonds of the Government to secure the ultimate redemption of the currency, that redemption not to be made in gold and silver, but in lawful money of the United States, which now means in greenbacks—irredeemable Federal notes, or rather in Federal promises to pay without any statement of the time when they are to be paid; it is called universally by bullionists irredeemable paper money; but which in point of fact is every day redeemed by the Government by taking it in payment of all dues and taxes except customs, for which it ought also to be taken. It is very plain that under the provisions of this bill it would be possible to increase the bank paper fourfold; so there would be four times as much bank paper as there are greenbacks with which to redeem it.

And be it observed that the same bill provides in section 3 for the redemption of its circulation through the Treasury of the United States only to the extent of 5 per cent. Note the first twelve lines of section 3; if they do not mean that, what do they mean? They read as follows:

> That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes.

That is a redemption, at the option of the holder of the bills, to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the fund provided, being 5 per cent. of the total; that is, it makes them convertible to that extent, at the option of the holder, into Treasury notes on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MAYNARD. The redemption does not extend only to 5 per cent. It is to be absolute as to the whole amount that may be presented by anybody. But 5 per cent. must be kept on hand.

Mr. MELLISH. I said that this was the effect of the bill, as I understood it. I understand it as I am explaining it. I may be mistaken, of course.

Mr. HUBBELL. I understand the redemption is to be made outside of and beyond the 5 per cent.

Mr. MELLISH. I have given the language of the bill, and it explains itself. I have read the bill in connection with the bills to which it refers.

Then the Secretary of the Treasury, after the notes are redeemed, is to charge them "to the respective associations issuing the same, and notify them severally on the 1st day of each month, or oftener at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum, in United States notes, equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed." Thus to the extent of 5 per cent. of the total circulation provision is made for the redemption, at the option of the holder, by the Secretary of the Treasury in greenbacks. To this extent it provides a place where the holder may convert his bank-notes into greenbacks on demand. They have come into a condition where the holder wants to get rid of them, and he exchanges them for greenbacks, and then the Secretary of the Treasury immediately sends them back to the bank. It changes the Government into a broker, to redeem the circulating notes of the banks and return them to the several banks. Take the whole system, and supposing the 5 per cent. were 20 or 25 per cent., it would simply be a plan for redeeming the bank circulation in greenbacks, and it would not be taking any single step toward redeeming in gold and silver.

Under this bill would it not be competent for any number of banks to be established, and take out currency to the amount of 90 per cent. of the bonds deposited? The new and old banks may run their circulation up as high as they please by filing bonds with the Secretary. The redemption of the bills is provided by the law to be in and by Treasury notes or other lawful money of the United States. Practically it does not provide for redemption in gold and silver, and practically it does not secure redemption in greenbacks. In an extreme case and a great exigency it does not provide a redemption except to the extent of 5 per cent., and that in the greenbacks, which are denounced by these same people as being irredeemable, dishonored promises to pay, and a fraud. These are the only basis of the redemption of their bills.

After having proposed this bill, with what propriety can they object, so far as the people are concerned, to retiring all the bank currency and issuing greenbacks as a substitute? To speak the plain truth, it is a bill entirely in the interest of the banks.

The eighth section contains the plan of giving to the banks the entire circulation of the United States. It is as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the beginning of each and every month from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange and as a substitute for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt, and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

It will be observed that gold is to be hoarded in the Treasury. They are turning the Government into a gold bull in the market and keeping up the price of gold. It is a plan to retire the whole greenback circulation, and give the whole $800,000,000 circulation to the banks. And when the substitution should have been complete of the bank paper for the total volume of greenbacks, the bank-bills would be redeemable by the Secretary of the Treasury in gold to the extent of the provision made by this bill for furnishing the means. The Government would become the great broker for the banks, with all the expense and trouble of it, and none to the banks. Meanwhile the Government would be paying interest to the banks on the capital on which their circulation was based; that is, would be paying interest on the total volume of the bank currency, and paying it in gold; for when greenbacks are retired gold and silver will be the only lawful money extant.

Under such a system it would be possible for the banks to run up the volume of their currency to a thousand millions for instance. There would be inflation of the most extraordinary character. Speculation, wild enterprises, and unprofitable investments of money, out of which would grow overproduction, stagnation of business, apprehension growing into panic, hoarding of gold, depreciation of bank-bills, a run upon the banks, which would all necessarily fail, and a run upon the Government. The 5 per cent. fund would be promptly exhausted, and the whole banking system would tumble into bankruptcy unless the universal remedy of the bullionist should be supplied in time, of legalized suspension of specie payments and all other payments, a new bankrupt law, no end of stay laws, laws which prohibit the execution of laws in the payment of debts, and the general misery that attends and is the fruit of the system of pretending to make the circulation of the country redeemable in the precious metals.

And I say right here, to quote the language of S. B. Chittenden, esq., in the National Board of Trade in Baltimore, January 16, 1874: "I do not know how many bank presidents or directors there are here, but I say, what I said five years ago, that there never will be any return to specie payments in this country under this bank system. This bank system must be reformed, and in a large measure reformed out of sight, before there can be any specie payments." Some one will say that Mr. Chittenden introduced a resolution that the simplest method for securing an elastic circulation would be found "in the removal of all restrictions upon the circulation of national-bank notes secured as now by the deposit of United States bonds for the redemption thereof." Very well; and he followed it by the language: "That is my free banking. That is my proposition of bringing this bank system to its metal." It would drive it out of existence. He says this is a method of bringing a test to the soundness of our bank system. This is the method of instructing the banks and the people that they are on a fool's basis, and they ought to disappear as a means of issuing currency. They have an investment in their bonds on which they draw interest, and then they can make ten or twelve at least on their circulation. The supposition is that banks that have become feeble have become so on mismanagement; they have not become so on their issue of currency.

I am quite sure that the bill reported by the committee is a bill of abominations, and ought to be defeated. Perhaps I should not be quite ready to indorse the criticism of a friend of mine, who upon looking at its provisions said, "If a member of Congress, after reading the eighth section, can support it, he must be either a fool or—a banker!"

I will only remark that that section proposes to change, at the rate of $24,000,000 per year, our greenbacks into notes of the United States, payable two years after date in gold, and to set the Government to hoarding gold to redeem the notes.

The great trouble is that the banks dictate legislation. I have no doubt, but I do not intend by the remark to cast any imputation on the committee or any member of Congress, that the bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committee is framed entirely in the interest of the national banks.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not know that the gentleman intends what some persons, hearing or reading his remarks, might suppose he did—a reflection upon gentlemen of the committee as to the manner in which this bill is framed. I am not aware that gentlemen of the committee are themselves interested in banks, national or otherwise, and, so far as I know, those who represented or were supposed to represent the views of existing banks were certainly not particularly partial to this bill.

Mr. MELLISH. I was careful to say that I did not intend to cast any reflection on the committee or any member of the House. I desire to have it distinctly understood that I disclaim any intention of casting any imputation on any person whatever.

Is this Congress to sit here and merely record the decrees of bloated corporations? As S. B. Chittenden, esq., of New York, said the other day (16th January, 1874) in the National Board of Trade in Baltimore, "We may never, by argument, convince the people as to what really is the matter; but, by and by, there will come a law which, like the gun of Fort Sumter, rising above all the arguments and all the discussions of seventy years, broke down the system which we all rejoice in as broken down to-day. So it will be with this bank system; and that, too, at no distant day."

I have time to devote but a very few words to Senator SHERMAN'S plan.

If it be admitted that convertibility at the option of the holder into coin is an essential quality of a sound circulating medium, such currency cannot be based upon gold bonds of the Government; for the bonds are not themselves convertible into gold at the option of the holder. The price of the bonds will fluctuate, and not under certain conditions bring par in the market.

It is a solecism in finance to assume that a circulating note payable on demand can be redeemed by another evidence of debt payable in the remote future, and have the transaction deemed equal to redemption in demand in coin.

And now let us briefly consider the bill (H. R. No. ——) to provide the money of the United States, and to regulate the value thereof.

The first section provides that every banking association may determine for itself the amount of lawful money it will keep on hand, and of course abolishes all the law requiring a reserve to be kept for any purpose, leaving all parties to deal with the bank or not, as they have confidence in it or not. But every national bank or banking association shall on demand redeem its circulating notes at par, at its own banking-house, in lawful money of the United States.

The second section requires the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare the money of the United States, which will express on its face the denominations of each bill, and express on its face that by the Constitution and laws of the United States the same is a standard measure of value to the amount expressed in all transactions within the United States involving the payment of money, and that it shall be receivable in payment of debts, public and private, and be a legal tender in payment of all debts except the United States bonds which are by their terms payable in gold, and that they shall be received in deposit at par by all national banks and banking associations, and that they shall be put in circulation in pursuance of the provisions of the act.

The third section provides that all customs duties due and payable to the United States shall be paid and collected in gold coin and paper currency from and after July, 1874, until July, 1875, one-fourth of the amount in Treasury notes, or other notes of the United States, or national-bank notes, and three-fourths in gold coin of the United States; and for the next period of one year the payment to be made one-half in gold; and for the third year three-fourths in Treasury notes and bank-notes and one-fourth in gold coin; and from and after the end of the third year, that is, July, 1877, the whole amount of customs duties to be paid and collected in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or national-bank notes. The effect of this during that whole period will be to put greenbacks, and bank-notes, and gold, and the newly provided national currency on a par.

Section 4 provides, after July, 1874, the method of returning to the Secretary of the Treasury all the proceeds of customs duties and taxes of the United States, with a view to the retirement of the greenbacks and the bank-notes, and the substitution in place thereof of the money of the United States, issued under the provisions of this bill.

Section 5 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury on receiving United States Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes shall make an account thereof, and as often as the sum received shall amount to $1,000,000 shall cause the same to be destroyed in pursuance of the provisions of the act establishing the national banks, passed June, 1864. It provides the method and confers the authority to destroy the greenbacks and the notes so received; and provides for keeping the banks advised of the amounts of circulating notes of each which shall have been destroyed; and as often as $50,000 of the circulating notes are destroyed the Secretary of the Treasury is to adjust the interest account of each bank and deliver up the amount of the United States bonds pledged to the redemption of a like amount.

Section 6 provides that immediately upon the destruction of any sum of Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes in pursuance of the preceding section, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, of the money of the United States, provided under section 2, an amount equal to the total sum of the notes destroyed; and that such money so paid into the Treasury shall thereafter become and be the money of the United States, and as such shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose and in the manner provided by law.

The seventh, and a very important section, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the said certificates provided in pursuance of this act, so that the aggregate amount of the issues thereof, in circulation and in the Treasury of the United States together, shall not at any time exceed the sum of $800,000,000; it being intended by this section to restrict the total volume of such certificates in actual use to within the maximum limit of the sum last mentioned.

And here it is proper to say that the most important feature of a system of currency and of a scheme of finance is to have one of the factors that affect prices absolutely fixed and unchangeable as to volume and value; so that the man of business may be able to adjust enterprises upon the assurance that in the establishment of his prices he shall be in no doubt whatever of the standard by which his prices are to be measured, leaving the problem to be determined between the vendor and purchaser of the price of the commodity at which it should be transferred; which being established with a currency the volume of which and the value of which cannot be acted upon by any power or circumstance outside of the nation, it will be relieved from the disastrous fluctuations which have always throughout the history of commerce and of banking subjected to a destructive degree the currencies which have been composed of, or based upon, the precious metals, the values of which never have been, never can be, stable in any country or for any length of time. For instance, a war, or a famine, or an insurrection, or a pestilence, or a vermilion edict promulgated in China, may make such a draft upon the volume and purchasing power of the precious metals in the world as to affect unfavorably their purchasing value.

The great war in which England was engaged for a long series of years against Napoleon made such demands upon the precious metals in the world as compelled the suspension and the continued suspension of the Bank of England for a number of years. Our own late rebellion compelled an entire suspension of specie payments in the United States. And the famine in India and war in Africa during the last half year, and the coinage of the precious metals in Germany, commenced I believe last September, and the existing famine in the British provinces in Asia have disturbed during all the period of their existence the volume and the purchasing value of the precious metals in this and every other country. In every treatise upon finance and banking, in every work upon political economy, in every public speech on either subject, made by a well-informed speaker, it has been shown us that relief from the mischiefs that attend and belong to the specie-basis system has been the main object sought for. By accident, and perhaps by the interposition of Providence, by our great war of the rebellion this nation was forced by circumstances into the necessity of trying the experiment of carrying on a great and exhausting war and following it by enterprises of peace unexampled in their extent and their beneficent results, with an irredeemable paper currency with scarcely the pretense and without the expectation that any single dollar of it could be turned into the precious metals at the will of the holder. And the success of that enforced experiment has been such as to confuse and astonish all financial speculations. And a system that could secure to this nation in perpetuity a currency as useful and as little subject to the usual mischiefs that attend currency as our currency has exhibited would be a boon to the nation worth making great sacrifices to attain.

Section 8 provides that after 80 per cent. of the aggregate of all notes of banking associations shall have been retired and destroyed, the remaining outstanding bank-notes shall not be received by the United States in payment of any public dues whatever; and thereafter the interest accruing on the bonds remaining in the hands of the Government as security for the redemption of circulating bank-notes shall not be paid to the banks until the whole amount of the circulating notes of such banks shall have been retired. This provision seems to be necessary in order to induce the final retirement and closing up of the bank circulation.

Section 9 and last provides that when under the provisions of the last section circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall be no longer receivable by the United States in payment of public dues, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem such circulating bank-notes at par, at points and places designated by him, by issuing and delivering in exchange therefor equal amounts of the United States certificates of standard value provided in pursuance of this act to the parties presenting such circulating notes for redemption, and shall destroy the circulating notes thus redeemed in the manner hereinbefore provided.

The adoption of this plan will give the greenback more value than it ever had before. The more debts that are paid in money the more value will the money possess. The law disallowing customs duties to be paid in gold restricts the legitimate uses of our paper money. By it the Government depreciates its own credit. To pay customs dues in greenbacks will add to the absolute wealth of every person in the United States who has a dollar in his pocket. If anything can be predicted with entire certainty, it is that greenbacks will approach much nearer and probably reach par with gold by making them receivable for customs dues.

As bearing on this question I take a paragraph from a letter I received to-day from M. de Embil, esq., New York, a gentleman who has published a number of financial pamphlets:

> France had $602,000,000 bank-notes, and had to pay $1,000,000,000 gold to Prussia. France had only $145,000,000 coin. By declaring bank-notes good for customs duties France kept her paper at par with coin. With the product of the mines the United States should have $140,000,000 in coin, and we ought to be as able as France to keep our paper currency at par with gold.
> Prussian taxes were paid exclusively in silver coin; coin went up 50 per cent.; the government declared that half the taxes would be received in paper; and coin and paper were at par one week thereafter.

We have said something about the effect of section 3 to put the three kinds of currency on a par each with the other. The effect of this measure would be that from July, 1874, until the final retirement of the greenbacks and the bank-notes, the currency would consist of the greenbacks, the bank-notes, and the money of the United States under and in pursuance of this act—three varieties of paper money, all of which would be at par value by reason of the fact that they were receivable for all public dues; and beyond question, in my judgment, they would all be on a par with gold. They would be equally sought for and equally available in payment of all public dues, including customs; and there would be in operation no interest to discriminate in the value of them. They would be taken indifferently and without discrimination, and paid out in the same manner in every portion of the United States.

The end would be that we should have a uniform currency of equal value in all parts of the United States, subject to no fluctuations of volume, subject to no risks growing out of any question about redemption, or any question about convertibility or inconvertibility; a currency that could not be disturbed or affected in its value or its volume by any exigencies occurring outside of the United States; a currency founded on the laws and the Constitution and the faith and the power of the Government; a currency that would address itself to the patriotic regard of the people of the United States, and be esteemed as unchangeable and safe, not subject to depreciation by the attrition that reduces the value of coin, nor by any means as subject as coin to be counterfeited and debased; a currency which would be equally available to banks as the present bank bills, and for which they would never be under any embarrassment for redemption; and, above all, a currency the volume of which and the quality of which could not be unfavorably operated upon or affected by anything except by the act of the Government itself; a currency more than one-third of the volume of which would each year pass into and out of the public Treasury in public dues to the Treasury and in liquidation of the debts of the country. And any volume of currency one-third or more of which is redeemed steadily every year by the party issuing it will have a better redemption than any currency ever yet known in this country.

This is a system which is plain and symmetrical and easily comprehended. It is a system that is absolutely honest—it is neither a sham nor a pretense; a system which does not demand any subsidy from the Government nor levy any tax upon the people; a system that is independent of all the tricks and all the debauchery of banking. Its circulation will be governed by the general laws of trade; and the currency will go to the point where it hears the loudest call. And that is the kind of flexibility that addresses itself to the judgment and approval of the unprejudiced and disinterested observer.

The great volume of financial history has been drawn from periods when the specie basis of currency was in conceded operation; and during such periods it presents a succession of chapters of financial fluctuation, panic, depression, bankruptcy, and disaster. There have been a few instances of extended terms when the currencies of countries were not on specie bases. In England, during long years (for fuller reference to which see speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, General B. F. BUTLER, February, 1869) its people probably never enjoyed any period of financial, commercial, and industrial prosperity at all comparable with that in which they were not on a specie basis. Commercial and financial vicissitudes disappeared with the suspension and reappeared with the resumption of specie payments.

More noteworthy even than that is the history of this country since suspension of specie payments. Contrary to all expectation and all prophecy, since the Government gave the people a paper currency and authorized a universal suspension of specie payments we have prospered beyond all example in this or any other country. It thus appears that a currency not convertible into specie on demand has in two instances, very striking in their characteristics, produced far better results than were ever exhibited by a specie basis currency. These facts go far toward establishing the claim that a currency fixed in volume, circulating by authority of the sovereign people, will be accepted and used by the people with honorable faith and produce and secure steadiness in prices such as has not been hitherto realized by any commercial people.

Inasmuch as our currency under the proposed plan would represent the dollar and its multiples, the critic or hypercritic will ask, What is a dollar? Answer: It is the name conventionally adopted as a unit of value. But what is it worth, and what do you measure a dollar by? Answer: By the same method as with the silver and gold dollar under the specie system—by another dollar of the same kind. But what is it worth? says the critic. It is worth as much wheat, or cloth, or leather, or salt, or rum, or tobacco, as you can buy with it. And that is all that can be said of a gold or silver dollar.

In trade, when prices differ or vary, no man can tell whether the commodity or the dollar changes in value. In the hands of a man who was starving, with pockets full of gold, and there was but one loaf of bread in the market, his gold would fall to a very low figure. Perhaps it is true in many cases that it is the value of money instead of property that fluctuates.

The Quarterly Review (London) for January, 1874, in an article on Bagehot's Lombard Street, remarks that "its author entirely discards the ancient notions about the quantity of the bank-note circulation regulating trade and prices. Facts and experience have indeed utterly destroyed it; and the doctrine that variations of the rate of interest are the real controlling power or instrument (as propounded by Mr. Tooke forty years ago) has become one of the most positive scientific truths in economical reasoning."

Now let us put this to the test of fact.

The Bankers' Magazine (London) for February, 1874, says of the fluctuations of the rate of discount of the Bank of England for the past year that "the year began with 5 per cent., descended through the various stages to 3½ per cent. by the end of January, and there remained for eight weeks; moved to 4, and remained six weeks; rose to 7 per cent. by the beginning of June, was down to 3 per cent. in August, up to 9 in November, and left off at 4½. The changes were twenty-four in number, and were fluctuating enough to keep the finance world wide awake with attention throughout the year."

Now, is it sound to say that those fluctuations to any great extent affected the prices of commodities? For it cannot be asserted that the law of trade made these changes of rates, but it was done by the manipulations of financial authority breaking into the law of trade.

The fact that the rate of interest went up and down twenty-four times in one year was no evidence that it was the result of the laws of trade; it is known, on the contrary, that it was official discretional interference with the laws of trade by the government of the Bank of England, and to protect the Bank of England and British interests against the natural operations of the laws of trade; and it is quite illogical to say that the result named is produced by the laws of trade.

This is all a delusion, to be classed with most arguments of free-traders, from the fact that they look through the eyes of British interests, and not through the vision of unprejudiced, disinterested, intellectual operations. This will explain a large proportion of the views and the financial philosophy of the British school of financiers. In point of fact, all the rates of interest by the Bank of England were intended to produce the effect to prevent an amount of contraction of the currency that would be destructive to the interests of trade.

Suppose that the bank had not the power of changing arbitrarily the rates of discount, then the unembarrassed laws of trade would have depleted all England of its specie to an extent that would have operated upon prices with most damaging effect. And hence the Bank of England, looking to British interests, was quite justified in giving a revolution to its omnipotent bullion screw, and setting the current of specie toward England instead of from it.

Bear witness that in the United States there are no such processes. And I beg to state no such processes are desirable. This is a free country, and we want to have business free in the United States; and we desire that there shall be nowhere and at no time a corporate power, or any other power, that shall be able to interfere arbitrarily with the prices of commodities in this country. Following out the principles upon which our Government is founded, we wish to have the utmost freedom in finance and trade compatible with the public interest and the public safety. Therefore we hold that it is of the first consequence to have the volume of currency fixed, its quality uniform in every part of the land, its legal character established by the power of the Government, its volume graduated with reference to the scale of existing prices in the United States, and leave the laws of trade the largest liberty to operate upon the basis of such a currency. It is clear that the laws of trade in a country which boasts of its commercial freedom are at the mercy of the conclusions of a few men sitting in the bank-parlor of the Bank of England on some morning of their meeting. It is fair to conclude, after such an exhibition, that there is no authority whatever in the opinions of the leading financiers of England.

The value of the currency of a country does not depend solely on its volume, but is affected very essentially by what we may describe as its rate of activity. An American dollar will pay one hundred debts where a French five-franc piece will pay one in the small transactions among the mass of the people; therefore France needs for the business she does a much larger quantity than the United States require, because hoarding and hiding currency here is confined to a small class of the ignorant and inexperienced; and in this country more and more the class of people who hoard is being diminished in number, especially at the North, as witness the savings-banks of New England, where civilization has advanced beyond the point where the people esteem money for any purpose except the uses for which money is intended. At the South it is probable that a portion of the colored population is just now entering upon that era in the movement of civilization which is consistent with hoarding on the part of the population generally. And it would not be surprising if it were proved at this hour that there was more currency in the late Confederate States than there ever was at any time before.

That Congress has the power to make Treasury notes a legal tender has been decided affirmatively by the Supreme Court, and that the Government should use no other currency I quote the opinion of Mr. Calhoun in his speech authorizing the issue of Treasury notes September 19, 1837:

I am of the impression, to make this great measure successful and secure it against reaction, some stable and safe medium of circulation, to take the place of bank-notes in the fiscal operations of the Government, ought to be issued. It is my impression that, in the present condition of the world, a paper currency in some form is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. I do not hear of any scheme which does not include a large volume of paper currency. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its greater cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount. The great desideratum is to ascertain what description of paper has the requisite qualities of being free from fluctuation in value and liability to abuse in the greatest perfection. I have shown, I trust, that bank-bills do not possess those requisites in a degree sufficiently high for this purpose. I go further. It appears to me, after bestowing the best attention I can give the subject, that no convertible paper, that is, no paper whose credit rests on a promise to pay, is suitable for currency. It is the form of credit proper in private transactions between man and man, but not for a standard of value to perform exchanges generally which constitute the appropriate functions of money.

And again:

I believe the Government credit, in the form I suggested, combines all the requisite qualities of a credit circulation in the highest degree, and also that Government ought not to use any other credit but its own in its financial operations. The good of society imperiously demands that there be a total and final separation of the credit of the Government from that of individuals, with which it has been so long blended, and the growing intelligence of the age will enforce it.

I would gladly quote more at large from Calhoun's speeches, but time will not allow, and I must content myself with the following summary statement of his opinions on this subject. Mr. Calhoun believed—

First. That "in the present condition of the world, a paper currency, in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities."

Second. That "the great desideratum is to ascertain what description of paper has the requisite qualities of being free from fluctuation in value and liability to abuse."

Third. That "bank-notes do not possess those requisites in a degree sufficiently high for a currency."

Fourth. That "no paper whose credit rests on a promise to pay is suitable for a currency."

Fifth. That "Government credit (in the form he had suggested) combines all the requisite qualities of a credit circulation in the highest degree, and that Government ought not to use any other credit but its own in its financial operations."

Sixth. That "whatever the Government receives and treats as money, is money; and if it be money, then they have the right, under the Constitution, to regulate it. Nay, they are bound by a high obligation to adopt the most efficient means, according to the nature of that which they have recognized as money, to give to it the utmost stability and value."

Seventh. That "the form in which the public credit should be used should be a paper issued by the Government, with the simple promise to receive it in all its dues."

His proposition was to convert the public credit into money; and he argued that the currency thus created would not only be equal in value to gold, but better than specie for financial and commercial operations, "by its greater cheapness, lightness, and facility of determining the amount." Having used Treasury notes as money, it is the duty of Congress to regulate their value.

As already hinted, the adoption of a plan to secure a uniform national currency may to the advantage of the country be supplemented by a measure which shall provide that the notes be convertible into three sixty-five bonds, and at all times reconvertible into notes, with accrued interest at the pleasure of the holder. It is claimed this will prove a trustworthy governor or regulator of the volume of the currency. With the proceeds received for these three sixty-five bonds the Government will buy and retire bonds bearing a higher rate of interest, and thus reduce the burden of the public debt.

By the adoption of this plan the actual volume of the currency (assuming that bonds of the denomination of fifty dollars and its multiples are not common currency, or properly so called) will be neither increased nor diminished except by the creation of the fifty millions of greenback reserve, to be applied solely to the redemption of the three sixty-five bonds, and any amount withdrawn from this redemption fund is to be placed again in reserve out of any United States notes not otherwise appropriated, received by the Treasury Department thereafter.

It needs no argument or illustration to show that the principal effect of this operation will be to retire United States bonds bearing a high rate of interest payable in gold, for United States bonds bearing a low rate of interest payable in paper. It would not be difficult also to show that the general rates of interest throughout the country must come down to much lower rates than now rule, and that they would be nearer a uniform rate than has ever before been known. Now, low interest is the life and soul of productive industry; and it would follow, as surely as the night follows the day, that a stimulus would be given to manufactures and commerce, and our country would exhibit a prosperity such as the sun never shone upon, and possibly other nations might conclude that they might as well follow the example of our power, industry, and system of finance.

It was with prophetic instinct that Cobden long ago said:

It is to the industry, the economy, and peaceful policy of America, and not to the growth of Russia, that our statesmen and politicians, of whatever creed, ought to direct their most anxious study; for it is by these, and not by the efforts of barbarian force, that the power and greatness of England are in danger of being superseded. Yes, by the successful rivalry of America shall we in all probability be placed second in the rank of nations. We cannot, while viewing the relative position of England and the United States at this moment, refrain from recurring to the somewhat parallel cases of Holland and Great Britain before the latter became a manufacturing state. The latter, England, now sees in America a competitor in every respect calculated to contend with advantage for the scepter of naval and commercial supremacy.

And would not the amount of debt thus funded be, to all intents and purposes, capital, and probably as much available as capital in all the uses to which capital may be applied as gold would be, and possibly as much more valuable than gold as the rate of interest payable on the bonds may be? And with the wheels of industry set in motion, as would be likely, all over the land, would it be too much to expect that our exports would before long be so much greater than our imports that, instead of sending our specie abroad to pay for European goods, (which serve little better purpose than to pamper pride and luxury,) the consumers of our grain, cotton, tobacco, naval stores, and other exports, would be compelled to send their specie here to settle the balance of trade?

It is believed that the notes or money issued are made convertible into bonds at such a rate of interest as will induce the holder to prefer bonds to notes. Does it require argument to satisfy an intelligent mind that the bonds being convertible into notes at the will of the holder, they may be converted into bonds at a less rate of interest than if they are made payable many years after date? For the bonds being convertible into notes at pleasure, the holders will convert notes into bonds; because while the bonds will always command the notes should the holder wish to use them as money, the bonds will also command ad interim the interest which the notes would not do. Would not the bonds, therefore, issued in this form, be more valuable than notes to all except to those who have an immediate use for them as money, and hence would there not be a constant tendency to convert the notes into bonds, and a consequent preference for bonds? Will not the effect of funding be to give greater value to the notes and also to the bonds? Most certainly? For will not the value of the bonds depend upon the value of the notes, and the value of the notes depend on the value of the bonds? We shall thus use the public credit (always guarding against excess in the volume of the currency) in a shape in which it is scarcely liable to depreciation, but, with customs dues paid in Government money, will rapidly appreciate to gold value.

And I find in a pamphlet issued some years since by General Duff Green, (who, it will be remembered, was quite a potential factor in General Jackson's administration,) the following paragraph bearing on this subject, which, perhaps, may be worthy of thoughtful consideration:

> It is apparent that it is not the cheap labor of England, but her cheap machinery, which enables England to sell us cheap goods. It is also apparent that she buys her cheap machinery with her cheap money; and it is equally apparent that she is indebted for her cheap money to the fact that her funded debt is readily converted into notes, so that he who can command the funded debt of England can command cheap machinery with which to make cheap goods. The debt of England having been converted into capital, is as available for all the uses of capital as if, instead of being a debt funded and paying an interest, it had been converted into gold. In that case, as the gold would be dead, unproductive capital, and the sum greatly more than would be used as currency, the whole excess not so used would be loaned out to persons who would pay an interest for it, and, as in that case the interest paid would be as great or greater than the interest paid upon the public debt, and would be paid by the same people, the debt thus created would be as much a debt upon the people; and, therefore, as the present debt represents the credits given by the Government in compensation for services rendered and supplies furnished by the people, the fact that it has been funded at a rate of interest which renders it of equal value with gold and convertible into gold proves that for all the uses of capital it is of equal value as if, instead of an issue of so much credit, the Government had paid out so much gold. Will not the effect of converting our credit into currency and funding the surplus into bonds which may again be converted into currency be to give equal value to our bonds?

Does any one believe that it would not as readily be made available for the uses of capital if, instead of being invested in the uncertain and fluctuating credit of individuals, it were invested in the public credit? If the sum thus invested is capital, would it not be capital if it were invested in our convertible bonds?

It is manifest that our currency should be exclusively national and a legal tender, and convertible into bonds, the interest upon which will render them of greater value than the notes to all persons, those only excepted who may prefer the notes without interest as a medium of payment and purchase; and the bonds should be at all times reconvertible into notes at the pleasure of the holder. Thus he who prefers bonds will give his notes for bonds, and he who prefers notes will give his bonds for notes. Such a currency will not be subject to the fluctuations consequent upon the contingencies which may affect the money market of London, and will compel the Bank of England to look elsewhere for specie. She may refuse to discount a single bill. She may withdraw all her own notes from circulation by the sale of exchequer bills. She may ruin her merchants, bankers, and manufacturers. She may spread bankruptcy and despair over the whole of England in her efforts to force back specie to her vaults; but as she cannot use our Treasury notes to pay her debts she cannot ruin us. We will have a currency of our own, which answers all our uses as money, will be stable and uniform in value, and leave the outside world, and especially the Bank of England, to look to our exports as the means of payment for all that we purchase of foreign nations.

Commerce is a reciprocal exchange of the products of the industry of commercial nations, and with such a currency we could place our exports in the foreign market and command specie if we desired to do so, and at the same time pay with our exports the balance due upon our imports, should there at any time be any such balance to pay.

The precious metals, gold and silver, have, by the consent of commercial nations, been recognized as a medium for the payment of commercial balances, and hence as they may be said to be of universal use for this purpose, they have become commodities, which, like other articles of merchandise, are more or less valuable as they may be required to pay these balances. This fact alone proves that foreign demand will depend upon circumstances over which our Congress can exercise no control. It follows conclusively that Congress cannot regulate the value of gold and silver.

But as there will be no such foreign demand for Treasury notes, if Congress issued them in payment of the current expenditures of Government and makes them a complete tender and convertible into bonds bearing a proper rate of interest, and provides that these bonds may again at the will of the holder be converted into notes, such a domestic currency will regulate the value of circulating commodities. It will be the medium of purchase and of payment, and the prices of commodities will be made to conform to the value of the medium of payment.

The panic and pressure on New York in 1857 was the result of the demand for coin to pay the expenses of the war in India—that the currency of France being silver, the Bank of England gave a premium for silver, which compelled the Bank of France to purchase gold to supply the place of the silver sent to India, and thus produced a pressure through the exchanges. Had New York then had a paper currency resting on the public credit, which, being a legal tender, would have prevented the export of gold, the pressure of the bank in London would not have caused the monetary crisis of 1857.

The bonds, reconvertible into notes which are money, will to a very great extent be used in preference to bills of exchange drawn by individuals.

It will be found that under this system of finance protection will be afforded to the value of property, and a stimulus given to industry such as was never before known in this or any other country.

Prehaps it may be objected that the plan proposed is a novelty, a new departure in finance. But the principles involved were long since approved by able thinkers.

On page 37 of Historical Sketches of American Paper Currency, (second series,) by Henry Phillips, jr., A. M., we find the fact recorded:

> The project of a new emission of paper money also began to attract the attention of the Congress, and although the measure was strenuously opposed by Dr. Franklin, who thought it would be preferable for them to borrow back their own notes at interest rather than add to the mass of paper in circulation, it was resolved on the 29th of November (1776) to issue an additional sum of $3,000,000.

And for the benefit of my friend from a Philadelphia district, [Mr. KELLEY,] though it has nothing to do with the matter in hand, I may mention, par parenthesis, that the inhabitants of that city refused the continental bills; their pretext being that, as the notes were issued for war purposes, the members of the Society of Friends could not conscientiously receive them.

Allusion will be found to this occurrence in Franklin's letter of April 22, 1779, to Samuel Cooper, (the Works of Benjamin Franklin, volume 3, page 328, by Jared Sparks,) in which he says:

> The depreciation of our money must, as you observe, greatly affect salary men, widows, and orphans. * * * I took all the pains I could in Congress to prevent the depreciation, by proposing, first, that the bills should bear interest; this was rejected, and they were struck as you see them. Secondly, after the first emission, I proposed that we should stop, strike no more, but borrow on interest those we had issued. This was not then approved of, and more bills were issued.

Is it too much to say that, had Franklin's advice been taken, a few millions only would have been required, as the paper would have returned to Government for the bonds on interest, and been paid out ad libitum, and peace would have found the country in a high state of prosperity, instead of the abject poverty which pervaded the land.

The friends of this bill, therefore, find they are supporting the financial principles that Franklin attempted to establish in the Congress of 1776. And there are few safer guides to follow in statesmanship than Benjamin Franklin. What is called a new departure in finance to-day, was advocated on the floor of Congress by Franklin one hundred years ago.

And Ricardo seems to have had in mind the advantages of a flexible currency when he says:

> Whenever individuals, then, have a want of confidence in each other, which disinclines them to deal on credit, or to accept in payment each other's checks, notes, or bills, more money, whether it be paper or metallic money, is in demand; and the advantage of a paper circulation, when established on correct principles, is, that this additional quantity can be presently supplied without occasioning any variation in the value of the whole currency, either as compared with bullion or with any other commodity; whereas with a system of metallic currency, this additional quantity cannot be so readily supplied, and when it is finally supplied, the whole of the currency, as well as bullion, has acquired an increased value.

Thomas Law, esq., many years ago in this city proposed that the Government issue a 4 per cent. stock, which every individual noteholder could obtain in exchange for every $100 of national currency.

I will not detain the House by further citations from, and names of, advocates of this advance and reform in national financial affairs.

Perhaps it may be asked, what is the test of a judicious amount of currency for a country, provided it does not pretend to have a promise of specie payment and is solely national? This is a question difficult of answer. We may talk of an amount per capita of the population, but that would be only the mode of expressing a sum, and would be no guide to a rational definition.

In the case supposed my first idea was that the prices of commodities, including a wide schedule of them, and the wages of labor, and rent of property, which is fixed capital, &c., should be considered and compared with prices of like commodities in countries with which we have commercial intercourse, before any sound conclusion could be reached. This view would be likely to suggest that the relation of prices in our country to the prices of other countries is the true test by which the volume of national currency should be graduated. General prosperity of the country would indicate that the volume of currency was not far from proper, whereas the absence of prosperity would indicate that it was amiss, being either too large or too small.

But considerable reflection has brought me to the conclusion that the simplest, safest, and best test is, that a paper dollar shall be at par value with a dollar in gold. And to produce that result is the aim and object of this bill.

How to keep the purchasing power of money the steadiest possible, is a difficult and important problem. That, and just taxation, are now the most vital questions of our great experiment of popular government.

If money were governed by the same rules as commodities, interest would be a test; but money, especially paper money, is not a commodity in precisely the same sense as applied to general articles of merchandise, and perhaps is not to be judged by the same rules. Of any material article there may be more than is wanted or can be used, in which case that article will have a very low price, or none; instance water, one of the prime necessities of existence, is so far in excess of human wants that it bears no price. But money never did and never can exist in such volume as to approach an equilibrium with the demand for it. Money, like alcoholic drink, creates a thirst and demand for more. Cheap money sets on foot numerous enterprises which cause an increased demand for more. If the enterprises are unwise or unproductive they, of all others, create the greatest call upon the money market, and offer the highest rates of interest. I am under the impression that the highest rates of interest generally prevail when a country seems to be full of money and to be on the flood-tide of business prosperity.

I think that we do not take a sufficiently broad view of the interest question, because we are in the mental habit of supposing that currency money only draws interest, and do not consider that the world is full of money that is not currency.

In fact, there are so many meanings to the word "money" that the mind and the speech fall into confusion. We must be more careful in our nomenclature, and our conclusions will be clearer. Money—currency money—may be loaned and draw interest; capital may be loaned and draw interest; and credit may be loaned and draw interest. We shall see by this that it is not logical to claim that the rate of interest will be regulated by the relation of the supply and demand for currency money alone; inasmuch as currency and capital and credit are all matters that may be and are constantly loaned. To determine whether the law of supply and demand applies to loans and affects the rate of interest, we must take into consideration everything and all transactions which may produce the state of debtor and creditor with the interest agio between them.

To illustrate: I wish to borrow $100,000 to purchase railroad stock. I apply to Vanderbilt and put up my securities, and he draws me a check for $100,000 on the Chemical Bank; I deposit it, and it is passed to my credit. No money has passed; I have borrowed of his capital, and pay him interest. I buy stock and pay for it by checks on the Chemical Bank. The whole transaction is complete, and no money has been used. I sell my farm for $20,000, and take in pay a house in town for $5,000 and a mortgage for $15,000 drawing interest. The transaction is complete and no money has passed. The United States loaned its credit for $2,000,000,000 or more, and gave bonds on interest, and took pay in importations, and very little money passed. The whole debt of all the people of the United States draws interest, and the chief portion of it is owed for commodities and labor. Of this vast mass of interest-bearing debt probably not 5 per cent. represents transactions where currency money was concerned in the transactions.

Does it not appear now that the volume of the currency money can have but slight effect in determining the rate of interest? Of course it is sound to say that the volume of currency money has an effect upon rates of interest. But the degree of the effect will be so slight as to be generally quite overbalanced by the other factors in the complicated problem; and therefore the rate of interest is not a test by which to determine whether the volume of currency money is excessive or deficient.

In further elucidation of this important subject I subjoin the views of Henry Carey Baird, esq. He presents interesting facts, but I am not prepared to agree with him entirely in all his conclusions:

PHILADELPHIA, March 22, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of 18th instant received, and as you desire I proceed to answer your two questions, which are as follows:

First. Is it true that an increase in the paper currency will only occasion a rise in the paper currency price of commodities, but will not cause an increase in the bullion price?

Secondly. Does increasing the volume of the currency tend to lower the rates of interest?

The second question I shall take up first, because in so doing I hope to be able to expose a fundamental error of the bullionists, and one which has an important bearing upon the answer to be made to the first question.

As might naturally be supposed, increasing the volume of the currency does tend to lower the rate of interest. That this should ever have been questioned seems most remarkable, but it has been done for the reason that to do so flowed logically and inevitably from the bullionist doctrine of David Hume, "that the prices of everything depend on the proportion between commodities and money," and that the only effect of an increase in the quantity of money is "to oblige every one to tell out a greater number of those shining bits of metal for clothes, furniture, and equipages, without increasing any one of the conveniences of life." And he went the further and necessary step and said, "It is in vain, therefore, to look for the cause of the fall or rise of interest in the greater or less quantity of gold and silver which is fixed in any nation."

To hold or admit the first proposition was to admit the last, for if prices increased in exact ratio with every increase of money, it must require a volume of money increasing in exact proportion to perform any given exchange. Thus, should the money double in volume with such results, it would require ten dollars where one had answered before, and the demand of the borower upon the lender for loans would keep even pace with the increase of money.

But are these things so? Let us see. Money flows from San Francisco, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, where the ordinary rate of interest is 10 or 12 per cent., to New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, where it is 6 or 7, and from these last-named cities it goes to England, France, Belgium, Germany, and Holland, where the rates are 3 and 4 per cent., and these movements have in some cases so run for a century or more.

Now, why is it that the rates are so low in England, France, Belgium, Germany, and Holland? Because of the large accumulation of money in these countries in proportion to the functions it has to perform therein. But it may be argued that the low charge for the use of money in these countries arises from their being old. Turkey and Portugal are equally so, and were possessed of magnificent industries and great wealth, until in evil hours in their histories they entered into commercial treaties with Great Britain and these industries and that wealth were destroyed. These countries are no longer importers of the treasure of the world. The last 6 per cent. loan of Turkey was sold in London in 1873 at 54, while that of Portugal of 3 per cent. was sold at home, in that same year, at 43.

But we need not go outside the borders of our own country to prove that "increasing the volume of the currency tends to lower the rates of interest," when we bear in mind that New England and New York, having the lion's share of the national-bank circulation, and wielding in addition, through their national banks, an immense mass of credit money, have money at 6 or 7 per cent., while the West, which has few banks, few national-bank notes, and few greenbacks, with but a trifling volume of credit money, has to pay about 10 per cent. as a minimum, and from that point all the way up to 60 per cent. per annum. Are not these facts worth more as a means of arriving at a knowledge of the truth in regard to this important question than any amount of the pure speculation of the philosophers? It would seem that they should be. But does the rate of interest fall in exact proportion to the increase in the volume of gold, silver, and paper money and their credit substitutes? No! and for the reason that the effect of an increase in the quantity is something more than "to oblige every one to tell out a greater number of those shining bits of metal," or of those pieces of printed paper, but that it is more in accordance with the following facts, also presented by Hume: "Accordingly," says he, "we find that in every kingdom into which money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly, everything takes a new face; labor and industry gain life; the merchant becomes more enterprising, the manufacturer more diligent and skillful, and even the farmer follows his plow with greater alacrity and attention."

"The new face" which "things have taken upon themselves" in Great Britain, with the steady increase of the precious metals for a century past, has been so remarkable that she not only finds use for a currency now estimated at $938,000,000, but has called to her aid credit money and other forms of the credit system, which amount is not less than $5,000,000,000. This vast volume of money and its substitutes has the effect of stimulating production, trade, and speculation to an extent hardly elsewhere known in the world. But while it furnishes to the people of England cheap money, the charge for its use has by no means fallen in proportion to the increase in its volume, because the uses for it have increased immensely with a great and growing business. This must be the case in any enterprising country, and has been so in our own, until, with a growing business stimulated by an adequate currency, afterward made an inadequate one, we have wound up with a crisis and paralysis. And just here we are brought to a realization of the danger which impends over any country, the law-makers of which assume to themselves the work of placing an arbitrary limit to the circulating medium, the "current money of the realm." Doing this they force the people to adopt a substitute, credit, which for a time stimulates business almost as much as would money, finally to wind up with a crash, when this credit has been "inflated" up to the point of explosion, to which it must be in time.

We may now turn to the consideration of your first question, which shall be done very briefly. It is not true that an increase of paper or of any other currency gives rise to any corresponding general increase of prices, and this is conclusively proven by the tables of prices and currency, 1782–1840, in the appendix to the second volume of Tooke's History of Prices, as well as by those in the chapter on the currency and prices, in Gibbon's Public Debt of the United States.

The real facts are that in all advancing countries the tendency is for all raw materials, including labor, to rise in price, and for finished commodities to fall, the introduction of improved machinery, including money, facilitating the conversion of these raw materials into finished forms.

The recent industrial histories of France, Belgium, and Germany, with their increasing volume of the precious metals and circulating notes, the increased price of all raw materials, including labor, and the cheapening of manufactured goods, and the growing demand of the rest of the world on them for their goods, with a corresponding demand from them upon the world for the precious metals, all go to prove this.

The fallacy that while any cause may "occasion a rise in the paper-currency price of commodities," it will not necessarily "cause an increase in the bullion price," is to be found in the famous Bullion Report to the House of Commons, June 8, 1810, and is the pivot upon which the entire report swings, and the cause of error throughout it.

Although thirteen years previously the Bank of England had suspended, and gold and silver had ceased to be the circulating medium, the real "current money of the realm," but in their stead Bank of England notes performed their office, the bullion committee enunciated the remarkable doctrine that "in this country, gold is itself the measure of all exchangeable value—the scale to which all money prices are referred."

They forgot that growing out of the imperfection of man's perceptions and capacities, all his standards were more or less arbitrary, indeed that the fact of needing them at all was an evidence of an imperfect nature. The value of coined gold, as a mode of comparing and of expressing prices and making exchanges, was no exception to the rule governing man and his appliances, and thus by the adoption and hourly use of a new species of machinery of exchange, gold itself became demonetized, and was but mere merchandise.

In this country to-day gold is mere merchandise, and while it is true the price of it exerts a certain influence over the prices of certain articles of foreign merchandise, and of American dependent upon the prices of foreign merchandise, it exerts no influence whatsoever over the great bulk of American property, both real and personal. Indeed it may be said that gold is the cheapest thing in the country, considering its scarcity and the amount we are under contract annually to deliver abroad. Is there one commodity in one thousand which is just 12 per cent. higher in greenbacks to-day than it was before the war in gold? For myself I know of none, gold alone excepted. Some are higher and many are lower, some even lower in currency than they were then in gold. Such being the facts, it will be hard, just impossible, to fit them into the theory of a rise in currency prices and not in gold prices. With many apologies for so far trespassing on your time and attention,

I am, very respectfully yours,

HENRY CAREY BAIRD.

DAVID B. MELLISH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

In a state of panic there is no supply or demand, because the man who has currency will not loan because he dare not loan; and the man who wants it dare not borrow because he dare not use it in enterprises. With the same volume of currency before the panic we were in a great state of prosperity; and money was very high, because those who had money were willing to lend; and those who wanted it were ready and prepared to pay high interest for it, and those who wanted it were greatly in excess of those who had it to lend. So that it is apparent that the volume of currency has but an incidental and casual but no regular effect upon the rate of interest. Abundant money begets the want and supposed necessity for more. It sets on foot numerous enterprises—some sound and some unsound. It sets on foot an abnormal demand for money when business seems most prosperous; and those who are engaged in unsound and unwise enterprises will necessarily become pressed for means, and become the very parties to bull the market of interest by making heavy demands upon it. And periodically or occasionally such things will occur under any state of currency; and cause only an absolute defeat or refusal of those who want to borrow. The time comes when the rate of interest cannot be carried high enough to induce those who have capital to part with it on account of the risk.

The main reason assigned why the rate of interest does not decrease with the increase of currency is, that an excess of currency stimulates speculation and extraordinary enterprises, which soon exhaust it; that there immediately arises a sharp demand for money for continuance of speculation in these costly investments, and in that competition for the currency the price naturally rises. Whether we have had enough currency is a question on which people differ. We have certainly had so much that there has been much briskness in gigantic stock speculations, like the Northern Pacific road and such enterprises.

And I may mention the somewhat curious fact that if you have a farm in the State of New York you cannot make a loan of money on it by a mortgage to an individual, the reason being that the mortgage is subject to taxation in the hands of the mortgagee; and that rate of taxation is destructive to it as an investment. The consequence is that money runs into the possession of the savings-banks and other institutions which can hold mortgages free from taxation.

I can scarcely see that the rate of exchange would be the exact measure of the balance of trade, for example, between us and England, unless the balance of trade included all our financial transactions as well as our trade in commodities. Instance: While we were going in debt on United States bonds to the tune of a thousand millions or more, those bonds affected the apparent balance of trade, as indicated by the rate on bills of exchange, as completely as the exportation of a thousand millions of agricultural or manufactured products would have done.

It would seem that the supply of paper money should be proportioned to the trade of the country, and from the nature of things the amount of Treasury notes in circulation must find its level in the public wants. Still the plea which is made that the wants of commerce, business transactions, require more currency may be no safe guide; for how can the sum required for such purpose be defined? Is not commerce likely to be insatiable in its demands? The question is not so much what amount of currency the wants of commerce can employ as the quantity that can remain in the channels of circulation without depreciation. Is there any safer rule than that the value of the paper dollar should not be less than the value of a dollar in gold? In other words, can any better rule be adopted than the one compendiously stated by Ricardo to the effect that "if the commerce of a country increases, that is to say, if by its savings it is enabled to add to its capital, such country will require an additional amount of circulating medium; but, under all circumstances, the currency ought to retain its bullion value; that is the only sure test by which we may know that it is not excessive."

If gold be not the test by which to estimate depression of greenbacks, what is?

Now, what is an excess of currency? Dr. Adam Smith used this word in a sense "as denoting a quantity greater than the circulation of the country can easily absorb or employ." But the commerce of the country can employ and absorb any amount within reasonable limits which may be sent into circulation. But we must have some rule or criterion by which stability can be given to the value of money, as that is the great test of the goodness of a currency as money. Indeed, this is the sole argument of any force I have ever heard from the bullionists—the danger of excess of issue. Let us "make assurance double sure" that their prophecies are not fulfilled.

Can we find a safer guide, one more satisfactory to the public in general, than that an excessive circulation is indicated by its depreciation below the par value of gold coin, dollar for dollar?

If so, then it follows that paper currency, when below par as compared with gold, should not be increased in volume and thereby further depreciated. It certainly must be regarded as an excess of paper in fact when we find an increased price of commodities solely arising out of and occasioned by an increased amount of the circulating medium. Is there not an excess of paper in circulation while it does not pass at gold value, dollar for dollar?

It was in accordance with these views that on Monday last I voted in favor of the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] "that hereafter the total amount of United States notes in circulation at any one time shall not exceed $356,000,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withdraw from circulation and to cancel whatever amount of such notes as are now in circulation beyond that sum, as soon as the same can be done consistently with the exigencies of the Treasury." And what I have said will also explain why I voted against fixing the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000, which was passed by the vote of 168 to 77. And I may say in passing that it is manifestly absurd for any Congress to attempt to legislate as in perpetuity in regard to the volume of greenbacks. I think it would be quite justifiable in any future Congress to regard such legislation as null and void. It is not fair to assume that all wisdom will die with this Congress, or that we know better how many greenbacks will be necessary in 1880 than will the then Representatives of the people. Of course this principle will apply to the farce of "a solemn pledge" in regard to limiting the volume of greenbacks passed some years ago, and about which has been let off so much of touching, not to say maudlin, eloquence. Even the Constitution fixes nothing in perpetuity. How absurd, then, to claim a greater scope for an enactment of Congress, which may be passed suddenly and under excitement, than can be claimed for a solemn provision of the Constitution itself!

And I beg to subjoin the bill referred to, and ask for it the consideration of the House:

A bill to provide the money of the United States, and to regulate the value thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, each and every national banking association may determine for itself the amount of lawful money of the United States that it will keep on hand; but every national bank and banking association shall, on demand, redeem its circulating notes at par at its own banking house, either in coin of the United States or in United States legal-tender notes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to prepare for circulation, as standard value United States money, certificates of the denomination of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, two hundred, five hundred, one thousand, two thousand, five thousand, and ten thousand dollars, to express on their face, in words and conspicuous figures, the several above-named denominations, with vignettes, letters, numbers, signatures, and such engraved decorations as shall tend to prevent forgeries and imitations, and also express on their face that they are respectively, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the standard and measure of values to the amount expressed on their face, in all transactions within the United States involving the payment of money, and receivable in payment of all debts, public and private, and shall be a legal tender at their face value therefor, except the funded debt of the United States, which is by its terms payable in gold, and except as hereinafter provided, and shall be received in deposit at par by all national banks and banking associations. Such certificates shall be put in circulation and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury under, in pursuance of, and in the manner in this act provided.

SEC. 3. That all customs duties due and payable to the United States shall be paid and collected in gold coin and paper currency as follows: From and after the 1st day of July, 1874, to and until the 30th day of June, 1875, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, one-fourth in Treasury notes, or other currency of the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and three-fourths in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1875, to and until the 30th day of June, 1876, both inclusive, said duties shall be paid and collected, one-half in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-half in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, to and until the 30th day of June, 1877, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, three-fourths in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-fourth in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1877, the whole amount of customs duties shall be paid and collected in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks.

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1874, all customs duties, proceeds of taxes, and sales of public lands, interest, and dues from all sources received for account of the United States in Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, by each and every officer of the United States, shall be transmitted in the identical currency received to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall issue and promulgate, to all Federal officers authorized to receive such moneys for account of the United States, rules, regulations, and instructions prescribing, directing, and regulating the time, manner, and means of transmitting such sums of money from the places where they are received to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and such rules, regulations, and instructions shall have like obligation and effect as if the same were embodied in this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury on receiving for account of the United States Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, as provided in the last section, shall cause a memorandum of all such notes to be made and kept in books appropriate for the purpose; and as often as the sum of notes so received shall amount to $1,000,000, he shall cause the same to be destroyed by burning them to ashes, as directed by section 24 of the act to provide a national currency, approved the 3d day of June, 1864. He shall cause a certificate and record of such destruction and burning to be made and entered in the books above mentioned, and a duplicate of so much of said certificate as relates to such portion of the destroyed paper currency as consisted of circulating notes of national banks (or associations) shall be transmitted to the several banks (or associations) the circulating notes of which shall have been destroyed, and then the amount of circulating notes permitted by law to be issued by such banks, respectively, shall be reduced to the extent of the circulating notes so destroyed; and when and as often as the circulating notes of any such bank or association shall have been destroyed, under the provisions of this act, to the amount of $50,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust the interest account with such bank or association, and release and deliver up an amount of the United States bonds pledged for the redemption of a like amount of the circulating notes of said bank or association.

SEC. 6. That immediately upon the destruction of any sum of Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, of and from the United States certificates of standard value authorized and provided under the provisions of this act, an amount equal to the total sum of Treasury notes and circulating national-bank notes so destroyed as aforesaid, and such certificates so paid into the Treasury shall thereupon and hereafter become and be the lawful money of the United States, and as such shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose and in the manner provided by law.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the said certificates provided in pursuance of this act so that the aggregate amount of the issues thereof, in circulation and in the Treasury of the United States together shall not at any time exceed the sum of $800,000,000; it being intended by this section to restrict the total volume of such certificates in actual use to within the maximum limit of the sum last above mentioned.

SEC. 8. That when, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, 80 per cent. of the aggregate amount of the circulating notes of the national banks and banking associations shall have been received by the Secretary of the Treasury and destroyed, and an equivalent amount of the bonds of the United States shall have been returned to said banks and banking associations, notice shall be given thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to each of such national banks and banking associations. And thereafter circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall not be received by the United States in payment of any public dues whatever, and thereafter the interest accruing on the bonds remaining in the possession of the Government as security for the redemption of circulating bank-notes shall not be paid to the banks until the whole amount of the circulating notes of such banks shall have been received and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That when under the provisions of the last section circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall be no longer receivable by the United States in payment of public dues, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem such circulating bank-notes at par, at points and places designated by him, by issuing and delivering in exchange therefor equal amounts of the United States certificates of standard value, provided in pursuance of this act, to the parties presenting such circulating notes for redemption, and shall destroy the circulating notes thus redeemed in the manner hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. BRIGHT obtained the floor.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will yield on the understanding that I retain my right to the floor, and shall have an opportunity to be heard in the morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 28, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. MACDOUGALL in the chair, as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

On motion of Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, the session of to-day is for debate only on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, much has been said upon the subject of the currency, but owing to the various interests of the country which are involved I do not deem it inappropriate to trespass further upon the patience of this House. The views which I have heard expressed have been various, as various as the standing points from which the question has been viewed.

Without further preface, Mr. Speaker, I propose to address myself to four propositions: first, that the currency of the United States is unequally and unjustly distributed according to the population and wealth; secondly, that it is insufficient in volume; thirdly, the probable quantity needed; fourthly, the way in which it may be supplied.

Upon the first proposition, as to the unequal and unjust apportionment of the currency, I would remark that the figures to substantiate that proposition are not new to this body; but the country is not as familiar with these figures as these Representatives, who have heard them repeated from day to day, and have read them for themselves.

In support of that first proposition, I beg leave to call the attention of this body to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, December 1, 1873, which shows that the six Eastern States have an excess of $70,690,046; the five Middle States have an excess of $9,416,503; the District of Columbia has an excess of $182,131; the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States have a deficiency of $51,271,034; the nine Western States have a deficiency of $21,423,811; the Pacific States and the Territories have a deficiency of $7,926,648. The Eastern and Middle States together have an excess of $80,589,742. The deficiency of Tennessee, my own State, is $5,373,382.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call my colleague's attention to the fact that in the Comptroller's tables the District of Columbia is classed with the Southern States, very improperly, I think; and in the enumeration I made I placed it with the Middle States, to which I thought it geographically belonged.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will say further, if my colleague will allow me, that I placed Ohio also with the Middle States, with which in point of fact she is connected by her commercial relations more than with the Western States.

Mr. BRIGHT. I observe to the House that I have followed the classification of the Comptroller of the Currency.

But to proceed. These figures are conclusive of the proposition as I have stated it. But in further support of the proposition permit me to call the attention of the House to another tabular statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, showing the per capita circulation. The six Eastern States have a per capita of 31.68; the five Middle States $12.82; the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States, including the District of Columbia, $2.91; the eight Western States $7.07; the per capita of Tennessee, my own State, being $2.66. Accompanying these I have the tabular statements which I shall not trouble this House with repeating. Suffice it to say, then, that the first proposition is arithmetically established.

Now, as to the second branch of the first proposition, that this distribution of the currency is unjustly made. Let us examine for a moment and see the effect of this ill-adjustment of the currency.

Take it in the New England States where it is abundant, where they assert it is sufficient, and what is the law of money or of finance? It is that the prices of commodities are appreciated in proportion to the quantity. What is the consequence following that? Where the manufacturing industries have the currency to pay high prices for labor, there are high prices for production. But what is the result of the appreciated value of these productions in the immediate vicinity? They are added to the cost of manufacture, and with this accumulated cost, in addition to transportation and insurance, they are sent broadcast over the land and sold to the consumers who have not the advantage of those who live in the immediate vicinity of the manufacture. Hence labor is high, productions are high, where the currency is abundant; and productions are cheap and labor is cheap where the currency is scarce. That is one of the evils under which the section of country from which I come is at present laboring.

But I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to elaborate, but only to suggest the principle of the operation of the thing.

But you say these parties must indemnify themselves by increasing the price of their own production. This is impossible, because the manufacturing interests have a protective tariff as a shield to them and are not affected by foreign competition; and in fact, by operation of law, the people are coerced to pay the high prices which may be fixed upon them with a diminished currency. So, Mr. Speaker, you can see the grinding and oppressive character of the adjustment of the currency, superinduced in the first place by operation of law, and augmented, in the second place, by the commercial contrivances of those who seek, not only to consolidate the currency, but to consolidate the trade of the country.

In the southern section of the country, to a very great extent, the productions are bought through the instrumentality of factors. The crops themselves are pledged. They pass into the hands of the factors, and from the factors to the commercial monopolists in New York and other great eastern cities, where the price of the productions is applied to the payment of the merchant's account, and where the currency is not distributed, but kept flowing in the immediate circle, except small balances which find their way South. There is the injustice of it, and there is no remedy without Congress shall interpose to relieve, as it has interposed to disturb, the financial harmony. I propose to show how that may be done hereafter. So they are left powerless, left without the indemnity of law; and while this is so, you find one section of the country wearing the mantling glow and smile of health and prosperity; and looking upon the other picture, you see the grim, gorgon features of bankruptcy.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to break down any industry of the country. I propose simply they should all march abreast in the great advance of improvement. Without dwelling further on that proposition I proceed to the second, that the outstanding currency, if equally distributed, is not equal to the national wants, present and prospective. This is a matter of figures. The inquiry confronts us, Mr. Speaker, how much currency is needed in the country? I say candidly no gentleman can undertake to answer the question with arithmetical correctness. We cannot tell how much currency exactly is in the country, nor can we tell exactly how much currency the country needs; but we can approximate to the necessities of the country, and by that approximation the statesman must regulate his conduct. I would state, Mr. Speaker, we cannot tell it from any law of territory of the country. We cannot tell it from any law of population. We cannot tell it from the quantity of the productions of the country. We cannot tell it from the commerce of the country. We cannot tell it from the nature and character of the indebtedness of the Government. We cannot tell it by either one of these taken by itself, but we must determine it by combination and consolidation of the whole of these interests, and that statesman who attempts to examine this question without combining and consolidating the whole, as stated by Mr. Caldwell in his Credit System, proves that he knows nothing at all about it. I will state further, Mr. Speaker, we cannot tell the quantity of currency needed by comparison with foreign countries. Why, we hear arguments based on European finances here every day. There is nothing, sir, more fallacious in their application to American finances and American statesmanship. Why so? Take, for example, Great Britain. An allusion has been made to the Bank of England, and the amount of currency per capita that is used for the necessities of the people of that nation. You find what? That four-fifths of the population of Great Britain live within cities and towns. In France from two-fifths to three-fifths live in cities and towns. The smaller the territory and the more dense the population, the more rapid is the circulation of the currency, and less in proportion to territory and population is needed there than in the United States.

But in addition to that those people live cheaper and fight cheaper and labor cheaper, besides their confined territory and their dense population, than they can in the United States. Hence, they are a different people, differently situated. And besides all this they are subject to the monopolies and prescriptive rights and privileged orders and grinding despotisms of that country, of which we see the incipient outgrowth and outcropping in the United States. So that I maintain that it has no application to this country. We find that the rights of property are all established there. The doctrine of primogeniture locks up estates and prevents their alienable character. The doctrine of dower, the doctrine of entail, have also restricted the alienation of estates. The rights of property there are so settled that they need but little currency to answer the purpose of sale in that country.

But, Mr. Speaker, when we come to our own country let us examine something of its character. We find an extent of territory here stretching from the Saint John, on the one hand, to the Rio Grande upon the other, and then from ocean to ocean in breadth, and with a population not only now reaching forty-odd millions, but rapidly increasing by the normal law, and by immigration, the artificial mode. So far, then, as the question of territory and population is concerned, we have a different state of things here from what exists in the Old World. So far as the wants of our people are concerned, they are different from those of the Old World. As I have said, they live cheaper over there, they labor cheaper, they fight cheaper than we do in the United States.

Now, in verification of that, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to a statistical table to be found in the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue of the United States for the year 1869, (see appendix,) being a comparative table showing the weekly expenses of families of workingmen in the United States and in Belgium, with this result: The expenses for two adults and three children in the United States per week, are $15.02 and in Belgium $4.55. Without amplifying any further upon that, I call attention also to a statistical table taken from the American Encyclopedia for 1863, showing that the whole of the European armies, amounting to 3,815,217 men, expended $644,283,888; while according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for 1863 we find that the United States expended for the Army $747,359,822, and for the Navy $82,177,510, making a total expenditure for the Army and Navy, of $829,532,338; being 38 per cent. more than all the war expenditures of Europe for that year. (See appendix.) So that the statistics show that they live three times as cheap and fight three times as cheap as they can or do in the United States. Hence, the comparison as to the quantity of currency in the two countries, the old and the new, must fail. We are a different people, with different ideas and under different circumstances.

And let me here make another suggestion which will help to free this question from the embarrassment of the comparison. While we should avoid European finances, we should avoid those European practices which keep the population in the condition I have indicated. There would be very little European fighting if the wealth of those countries had to pay the taxes. There perhaps would be little fighting in this country if the wealth of the country had to pay the taxes. But by their financial contrivances they throw the burden of the taxes and the national debt upon the consumption of the country. By the consumption of the country they pay three-fourths of the revenues of Great Britain at this day; and perhaps it is the same in France. The burden falls upon those who have no property. It falls upon the bone and the sinew and the sweat of the toiling millions of those countries; and to escape it, while their property is locked up at extraordinary prices and bound in the fetters of primogeniture and dower and entail, these thousands and millions are seeking relief in this western land of ours, and arriving here from the old country they are as unreturning as if they had gone out into eternity. We do not propose to imitate those examples, dangerous in the extreme; and I hope we will have no more of it by American statesmen in their comparison of finances and character of governments between the two.

But to return to our own country. I have described the territory, I have alluded to the population. Now, as to the character of the property, we have no law of primogeniture here; everything is free and alienable, and exchange of property is stimulated almost to a passion in America. This exchange cannot be effected without currency to a certain extent. We are not a people that are confined to barter and to that alone. That would be impossible in the nature of things. But then, in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, we have diversified industries. And not only does the currency flow more sluggishly in a vast territory and in a more sparse population, but in proportion to the increase of its industries and the diversification of these industries, it takes longer to hunt up the channels and flow through them, than if there was only one grand sweeping commercial tide to draw everything into, as into a vast maelstrom of financial power. The case is entirely different.

Then, Mr. Speaker, permit me to call the attention of the House not only to our diversified interests, but to our national wealth. The assessed valuation, according to official returns, in 1870, was as follows: personal property, $4,264,205,000; real estate, $9,914,000,000; total assessed valuation, $14,178,205,000. The total valuation in 1870, according to official returns of the wealth of the country, was $30,608,518,570. That was the valuation of 1869. And taking the increase since, according to the ratio adopted by the Special Commissioner—13.4 per cent. per annum—we have the present aggregate wealth of the country, $42,000,000,000, all alienable, all perhaps in the market in one form or other; and it requires some currency, I suppose, to effect an exchange in the property of the United States.

But then what are the annual productions? I have here a table showing approximately the resources and wealth of the country, and I find that the agricultural products, including stock, &c., amounted in value, according to official returns of 1870, to $2,447,000,000; manufacturing industries, $4,232,000,000; mining industries, $152,000,000; fisheries, as far as returned, $11,096,000. Add the increase up to this day at the usual rate of 10 per cent. per annum and you have an increase of $3,421,000,000, making a grand total of the annual productions of the United States of $10,235,000,000; and according to the Commissioner of Agriculture six billions or upward of this vast annual production is marketable. Where is the currency now to float these six billions of annual productions in this country?

Erect a monument just there, and permit me to call your attention to other points. The increase of population and the annual productions are great monsters; but there are others looming up in succession like the poet's vision:

> Increasing prospects tire our wondering eyes,
> Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise.

I turn now to the national debt and the State and county debts. The national debt, as per the last report, amounted to $2,291,000,000. Dr. McPherson, in his Hand-Book for 1873, page 183, estimates the State, county, and town debts in 1870 at $864,785,067; of the Territories for the same time $3,891,691; making the indebtedness $3,116,469,000. Add to these the debts of individuals and corporations, supposed to be $5,000,000,000, and we have the total indebtedness of the United States of $8,160,469,000, and of this sum the national banks show a liability of $1,830,637,000. Most of this national debt is bearing an interest of 6 per cent. Now, how much money do you suppose is needed to pay the interest on the national debt alone? Try your arithmetic a little. It takes about $500,000,000 to pay the national interest alone! Is there any avoiding this? This does not touch the body of the debt. Where is the money to come from to pay that interest? But we do not stop there. The last report of the Treasurer shows the annual taxation of the United States to be about $330,000,000. According to Dr. McPherson, the State, county, town, and city taxation for 1870 was $278,391,286; of the Territories, $2,789,026; making an aggregate of taxation of $611,180,320, being about $14 per capita of our entire population. Now let me inquire where the money must come from to meet the taxation of the people. Sir, this taxation is scattered all over the country, in all the States, towns, and cities. It is not confined to New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. The fingers of the Government are to be found on every hill and in every hollow, hunting for the nests of the people's wealth to tax it, and it must have its share of that wealth, even though it have to put the property of the citizen up under the hammer. The taxation of the country now nearly equals the amount of currency in circulation. Where is it to come from? But, sir, we do not stop there. Let us turn our eyes to the railroads of the United States, and see if they require any currency.

The length of railroads in the United States on the 1st of January, 1873, was 70,178 miles. The cost of these lines, estimating the cost at $50,000 per mile, makes an investment in railroads of $3,508,000,000. According to the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, page 28, there were in the last five years expended annually in the construction of railroads $340,000,000, making within the last five years $1,700,000,000. The report of H. V. Poor for the year 1871, on page 26, says that "the total earnings of the 50,000 miles of railroad in the United States for 1870, at $9,000 per mile, were equal to $450,000,000." The increase since that time will give $631,602,000 for the year 1873. This, added to the construction account, would make $1,000,000,000 per annum. Now, where do the railroads draw the currency from with which they can operate? Are they to have no money? From whence do they obtain the money needed for the construction of their roads, and the furnishing of them with rolling-stock, and the payment of labor, and the subsistence of laborers? Money must be had in order to level our mountains and fill our valleys. Where does that money come from? And still the cry is "More roads, more canals; clean out the lakes and rivers, fill your valleys, and remove your mountains!" Will that require no money? I tell you it will require an enormous amount. And I will tell you another thing, that unless there is more currency the construction of railroads will stop. You will never construct a canal without more money; you will never build another railroad of any magnitude without more money; and we have seen evidence even in this House, during this session, so far as the improvement of our lakes, rivers, and harbors is concerned, where the pruning-knife has been laid to them as the first evidence of retrenchment in the public improvements of the country.

But we do not stop there. Here we have a merchandise account. In 1873 we had $642,030,539 of imports thrown into the volume of commerce and merchandise of the country. That must be distributed all over the land in connection with the other textiles and fabrics that are thrown out for the consumption of our people. Does all this require the expenditure of no money? Are our foreign imports to be kept up without money? Why, sir, you may put it down, but what is the inevitable result? People cease to import because they cannot find consumption. And the reverse of that follows; they cease to buy your productions unless you keep up your international exchange.

Besides all this, we have the rural mechanic, the schools and colleges and book establishments, the newspapers and the professions, the charities and religions to support, houses to build, the towns and cities to construct, new States to found, and your whole country to improve and adorn. Where is the money to come from? The whole country is demanding money, money, money, except in the New England and Middle States. And money they must have, and money they will have, sooner or later, mark my word for it.

We have a live, pushing people, every day developing, every day building up, every day expanding. And while there may be more extravagance than I can commend, still the fact is we are an expanding people; we must have money to keep alive the prosperity of the country as we understand its prosperity.

Why, sir, from the increase, natural and artificial, in our country, from the push and enterprise of our labors and our industries, your Comptroller of the Currency can scarcely sit down and make out his calculations of the actual value and wealth of the country and its demands for currency before the rate of speed of our improvements has outstripped and left the calculations as the fly does the chrysalis. Now, to tell us that we are to go according to the old Scotch slow gait, jogging on to mill with an old Sober John of a horse, with the staple stone in one end of the bag and the grist in the other, simply because Scotland, Great Britain, or France did the same thing, is a very poor argument to illustrate American statesmanship and American affairs.

But I cannot stop to dwell upon this further. I have said that the currency was insufficient. How much do we need to float and keep afloat all these enormous interests? Where is the arithmetic that will tell you? Where is the backbone of your financial system that will bear it up? I will endeavor to show that you have not, with the consolidated power of your banks and with the financial power of your Government to back them up, been able to bear the first strain of demand upon your currency, but it gave way; and the terror of a panic shook this country worse than old Bald Mountain is now shaking the inhabitants of North Carolina. [Laughter.]

We are all the time increasing and developing. Does it not require more to support the United States than a single State; more to support a State than a county; more to support a county than a village? Now let us look a little at the history of this thing. Your attention, gentlemen, if you please. In 1782 we had one bank in the United States; in 1790 we had four banks; in 1800 we had twenty-eight banks; in 1810 we had eighty-nine banks; in 1820, three hundred and eight; in 1830, three hundred and thirty; in 1840, nine hundred and seven; in 1850, eight hundred and twenty-four; in 1857, fourteen hundred; and now we have two thousand banks. Why this increase? Simply because your country has increased in its resources and in its demands for currency.

The following table, prepared by Mr. Walker in his Science of Wealth, (page 161,) gives the increase and fluctuations of mixed currency circulation and deposit, from 1834 to 1859, showing the currency in 1834 to have been $170,000,000, and in 1859, $452,000,000:

Year.	Currency.	Year.	Currency.
1835	186,000,000	1848	331,000,000
1836	255,000,000	1849	205,000,000
1837	276,000,000	1850	240,000,000
1838	200,000,000	1851	284,000,000
1839	225,000,000	1852	328,000,000
1840	182,000,000	1853	348,000,000
1841	172,000,000	1854	392,000,000
1842	146,000,000	1855	377,000,000
1843	114,000,000	1856	408,000,000
1844	159,000,000	1857	445,000,000
1845	177,000,000	1858	341,000,000
1846	202,000,000	1859	452,000,000

Now I ask Representatives to give their special attention to a tabular statement which I have here, from a report of a Secretary of the Treasury, August 31, 1865, and the Finance Report of 1867, pages 3 and 4, when the currency reached its maximum. I will give the round numbers only. There were of 5 per cent. legal-tender notes, $33,000,000; compound-interest notes, $217,000,000; seven-thirties, $830,000,000; United States legal-tender notes, $433,000,000; fractional currency, $26,000,000; cash in the Treasury, $88,000,000; temporary loans used as currency, $107,000,000; certificates of indebtedness representing currency, $85,000,000; making in all $1,820,943,469 of Government currency in circulation at that time. Add to that national-bank notes in circulation at that time, $131,452,000; State-bank notes, say, $240,000,000, and you have in all, on the 31st of August, 1865, a total circulation of $2,192,395,627.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Having called my attention to this large amount of currency, I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether or not he means there was that much currency in circulation; the larger part of it being a kind of currency that was drawing interest, and consequently more in the nature of an investment than of currency in the hands of the people. I merely want to know if the gentleman understands it as a currency circulating among the people.

Mr. BRIGHT. It was used for the purposes of a currency.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I allude to that portion of it bearing interest.

Mr. BRIGHT. Some of these issues bore interest, but still at the same time they were used as a currency in the country. They were scattered all over the country, not only in New York, Pennsylvania, and other Eastern States, but some few stragglers in their vagrancy found their way even to my own State.

Mr. MAYNARD. If my colleague will allow me, I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] that those issues of which he speaks were engraved and prepared in a form to circulate as money; and as a matter of fact they did so circulate until the interest accumulated so as to make them superior to the ordinary class of currency, and they formed part of the reserve of the national banks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I must remind the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MAYNARD] that Mr. McCulloch in his report of 1865, speaking of a large portion of this currency drawing interest, stated that only $30,000,000 of it were performing the functions of currency, although several hundred millions of it were afloat.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, that was his opinion.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I state the amount of that currency as reported in the table which is before me—money which was used as currency and treated as currency. The Secretary tells us that he contracted in 1866 and 1867, by funding it in bonds, $686,584,800; in round numbers, $340,000,000 per annum. Such a contraction, I venture to say, was never before witnessed upon the face of the globe by the ordinary operations of government. In two years $686,000,000 were taken out of the circulation of the country!

But I do not stop there. I shall not follow the reduction of the currency for the different years, but I will look to the reduction as it appears from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, December 1, 1873, wherein he shows of national-bank currency, $350,000,000; of legal-tender notes, $366,000,000; of fractional currency, $47,000,000; making altogether $759,000,000; from which deduct the reserve, $128,000,000, leaving $631,020,512 as the only available circulating medium in the United States; I mean Government circulation.

On page 88 of the same report the same officer shows the amount of outstanding State-bank notes, $174,714. Page 59 of the report of the Treasurer of the United States shows, outstanding of seven-thirty notes on the 1st of July, 1873, $293,450.

Now I beg attention to the summary:

National-bank notes, legal-tender notes, and fractional currency, as per report of the Comptroller of the Currency	$631,020,512
State-bank notes	174,714
Seven-thirty notes	293,450
Total available currency in the United States, (gold excepted, which was a commodity)	631,488,676

The reserves, being held by the Treasury and by the banks, are not added, because they were held as security and not as circulation.

Now, let us see the summary of the reduction. On the 31st of August, 1865, we had $2,193,395,627 of currency. On the 1st of November, 1873, we had $631,488,677, making a reduction of $1,560,906,851, or an annual reduction, during eight years, of $195,113,356. Where did it go? It was swallowed up in the bonded debt of the United States.

Where is the proof? Look to the destruction account of the Treasurer, which is before me. It shows an actual destruction of upward of $1,900,000,000 of this circulation. I do not mean the statistical destruction, but the destruction of the currency. In addition to that, you have driven out of circulation the notes of the State banks, leaving only $631,488,000 of currency in the United States—to answer what purpose? To spread over illimitable territory; to distribute among forty-five millions of people; to furnish money for sales of capital or wealth, amounting now to about $40,000,000,000; to pay national, State, county, city, corporation, and individual indebtedness, amounting to $9,000,000,000; to pay for the marketable proportion of annual productions of all sorts, $10,000,000,000; to pay taxation, United States, State, county, and town, $611,000,000; to pay interest on the public debt and private debt, $500,000,000; to pay for the annual construction and operation of railroads in the United States, $1,000,000,000; to pay for annual imports into the United States, $642,000,000; to pay for the support of schools, colleges, churches, book concerns, newspapers, for building houses and towns, founding new States, and to pay for the personal expenses of the millions that move every day upon the railroads and public thoroughfares, $500,000,000 more.

Ah! where is your money to float, and keep afloat, these vast interests? The outstanding amount is altogether insufficient, as is proven by the vast body of demands against it which I have recited. It is proven by the Eastern States objecting to a reduction, though some of them have as high as sixty-one dollars per capita; by the deficiency of the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States, they having only $2.91 per capita; by the deficiency of the Western States, they having only $7.09 per capita; by the comparison of currency, by which it appears that the Southern and Southwestern States in 1862 had of paper currency $71,000,000; while in 1873 they had only $38,000,000; by a comparison of productions, the gross productions of the Southern and Southwestern States being, in 1873, according to a tabular statement which I have here, $2,038,000,000, more than half of which is thrown upon the market; while in 1860, so far as can be ascertained from the census report, the amount was less than half; by comparison of prices of merchandise and mechanical implements, which, it appears, were, in 1870, 50 per cent. higher than in 1860, though the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States had twice the amount of currency in 1860, while they have twice the annual productions now; by the great increase in national wealth and resources; by the twenty-fold increase in debt and taxation; by the reduction in prices of land, amounting to from 50 to 500 per cent. all through the southern section of country; by the dead-lock of trade; by the wrecks of fortunes, great and small; by the bankruptcy which stares the country in the face; by the cry of two-thirds of the population of the United States, demanding "money, money, money," in order to relieve their wants in a financial point of view, and to save them from bankruptcy.

But some gentlemen may say, "You down South there perhaps do not deserve this currency." Do not make that fatal argument against yourselves. You may abuse us; you may entertain a heartless and vindictive spirit toward that section of the country; you may destroy her industries if you choose; you may butcher her, but like the dead Siamese twin (and permit me to follow out the figure) she will spread mortification to every interest you have. Whenever she ceases to buy your manufactured articles the fires of your mills will be put out; when she ceases to buy your cotton goods the hum of your factories will be hushed; when she ceases to exchange her cotton with you, then your factories and workshops will all sink and perish. Mr. Speaker, whenever she ceases to give her influence and help to the mighty productions of this country, you will find you will sink in a corresponding scale. Mark it, and do not forget it, that it is to your interest as well as to hers to see that all the industries of this country of every section march abreast, and not that the grinding heel of the Government shall be upon one alone. It will recoil upon you; ay, it has recoiled upon you, for the prosperity of one section is the prosperity of every other section and the decay of one section is the decay of every other section to a greater or a less extent.

Then, sir, how much currency is needed? I cannot answer the question, but I venture to say one thing. Distribute $500,000,000 broadcast this day in the land and it will be swallowed up like the water upon a parched desert. Add it, if you choose, to the currency already in the United States at this time, and it still will not make half the amount you had in 1865. Add it to what we have at this time, and it will not make an amount more than equal to the loan account of the national banks against the people of the country. As a plan, however, I would suggest that it might be issued in five equal annual installments. By this process it would be rapidly absorbep in the liquidation of debts and profitable investments; would be combined with labor and intermingled with our diversified industries; made active in production and tributary to national wealth, instead of being locked up in a bonded debt, whose only active property is that of the eating cancer, consuming the body on which it is fastened.

But how shall we get it? I have a plan of my own. How did we lose it? What became of it? In the first place it was retired in five-twenty and other bonds. The principle is easy—redeem or pay off the five-twenty bonds in legal-tender notes and restore the equilibrium which was lost when these notes were retired. You will then improve the finances of the country instead of following the process which has been so oppressive in its character. Restore the lost equilibrium and your vessel will sail upon the bounding waves of prosperity. Redeem your five-twenty bonds, pay them off and give the country legal-tenders. It needs them. When you retire the five-twenty bonds and give the country legal-tenders it will send the blood from the heart to the extremities. It will make the first mantling glow of health upon the cheek of the nation. The country will show again signs of vitality and blood. Instead of the skeleton you will see a body full of flesh and life and vigor.

But I am told that what the country wants is to come to a gold basis. So do I want it. I want to have my foot planted upon it.

You can redeem every one of these legal-tenders in gold. You can redeem them in installments and it will not cost the country a solitary cent of interest. If you make a distribution of that sort it will save untold millions.

But we are told we cannot do it, that the Constitution rises before us and opposes an impassable barrier. I tell you we can. Why, sir, are these bonds payable in bullion or coin? No. What does the Supreme Court say in the Trebilcock-Wilson case, 12 Wallace, 695? This case is a battle-ax with which I can cleave down every opposing theory. But time does not permit me to enlarge.

Your legal-tenders bear upon their face that they are good for the payment of all debts, public or private, except interest on the public debt and duties on imports. Bonds do not form one of the excepted cases, but, as a matter of course, are payable as any other debts.

It is known to every gentleman that you passed an act in 1869 saying you would redeem this debt in gold. Suppose you did. It did not form any part of the contract. It was a legislative act and bound nobody, but simply authorized the Government officer to pay in gold. Whenever you repeal it, it is at an end. It is not like the law of the Medes and Persians.

Where is the bad faith? When you say that you shall not pay them in legal-tenders who is defrauded, who is injured? The people of this country, by mere technicalities, brought under the power of an overgrown moneyed aristocracy in the country, the bondholders? Give the people the gold.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed. How much more time does he wish?

Mr. BRIGHT. About ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman's time being extended.

Mr. BRIGHT. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot dwell upon that part of the subject. These five-twenty bonds, as I have argued, are payable in legal-tenders; and the notes issued under the acts of February 25, 1862, and July, 1862, and March, 1863, and the series of 1869, all bear upon their face that they are receivable for all debts, public and private, except interest upon the public debt and duties upon imports. But I will not dwell upon that. I would give the bondholder all that he has a right to claim of the Government. He shall have his pound of flesh. I mean no dishonor, and sooner or later you will find that this country will drive directly to that point in order to save itself from enormous evils.

Now, let us look at these bonds. They have three great roots. One is the interest which is payable to their holders. Another one is the tariff root that strikes under and supports that. Another is the bank root. All mighty roots, that are supported from this bonded debt of the country. Why, sir, here is an interest debt of one hundred and twenty millions. That is levied by means of duties collectible in gold. Your manufacturing establishments all raise the manufactured articles to the same prices under shelter of protection, and they swell to about three or four times as much as the actual revenue duty that is collected; and if we collect one hundred and twenty millions of duties, suppose you add three hundred millions protection to it, and you have four hundred and fifty millions. Then you furnish them as a banking capital which makes a gross profit of a little less than one hundred and fifty millions a year—I know of what I speak—not their returned profits, but the gross profits, and which the country has to pay.

Hence, I say that this bonded debt ought to be paid off; that it is costing the Government and the people of this country now between five and six hundred million dollars a year. I know it is a contrivance not easily understood by the people; but nevertheless the fact so exists.

So far as these banks are concerned, I have a tabular statement here (Walker's Science of Wealth, page 237) showing how the sixteen hundred and forty-three banks in 1868 had an active capital of five hundred and twenty-five millions, and upon that they had received interest upon $1,070,160,000; and if we apply the same ratio to the existing banks, they have an active capital now of $665,902,000, on which they are doing a business of $1,830,000,000. The following is a summary of the working of 1,643 banks on the 1st of April, 1868:

*The redemption cities, in addition to New York, are Boston, Albany, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Washington, New Orleans, Louisville, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Saint Louis, and San Francisco.

And they are collecting interest of the people of the country of nearly that whole amount, while they do not produce one single blade of grass or contribute one atom to the aggregate wealth of the country. They are mere instruments of absorption, like mighty sponges applied to the substance of the country, wringing it out and receiving it into their own vaults and to their own advantage.

Why, sir, what do I find in regard to these national banks, from an investigation of them? They cannot increase the currency beyond the limits now fixed by law; but I find that they expand business by loans and discounts. Like the old State banks, I find that they become the reservoirs of all the currency in the country, that they hunt it up and turn all the channels of the money into their own vaults to get the control and the power over it. I find that they thrive best in hard times just as the banks of discount and deposit do, and that they can put the screws down and raise the interest and their profits upon the people, just to the extent they are positively able to bear it. I find that like State banks they expand and contract from the same causes, causing expansion and contraction of prices. They make the standard of values high at one time and low at another; produce irregularities in the industries of the country; gamble in stocks; suspend, break, create panics, freeze up the channels of trade, and cause bankruptcy and ruin in the country. The recent panic cost this country $1,000,000,000, and I dare to make the assertion good whenever it becomes necessary to do so, in paying for the suspension of business, destitution, loss of labor, the sacrifice of property, and contraction in its value.

We find that all banks will suspend or break, from the old bank of Genoa down to Jay Cooke & Co. Even the railroad interest, when it bore down upon them, made every tendon of the banking system crack, and made even the Government financial prop itself give way. They had sold their bonds in Europe until they had glutted that market. They went to New York and there put their bonds in the market when they could not force them abroad, and got the banks to make loans upon them; but whenever the money was wanted for the purposes of trade and commerce, why you found that they could not manage the stocks that had been thrown upon them. Then it was that the people became alarmed, not for the ultimate security of the banks, but because they could not get their money to pay their debts. They rose against the monster that created the panic.

It is not expansion that creates ruin, because the prices of productions will increase with expansion; but whenever you contract your currency, you contract prices everywhere but do not contract your debt. I repeat, it is not expansion, but contraction, that ruins the country. Our Government went in debt and then contracted its currency, but never contracted its debt; so that it now requires three times the quantity of productions to pay the debts of the Government and individuals as it did before the contraction in 1865. That is where the difficulty is. What the country needs is more legal-tenders, more money and less debt.

Now, as to the bill before the House, I might, and perhaps shall, vote for it as a choice of evils. If nothing better can be obtained, I may be compelled to accept it; but I shall do so only as a means of breaking up our consolidated system of finance and trade; I shall use it as a lever to lift the stranded vessel over the shoal, in the hope that at another time we shall readjust our finances and give the people a currency that will be sound and safe, do justice to all, and cost the people nothing, or at least bear equally on all and oppressively on none.

In conclusion, I ask the attention of the House to the following petition of leading and representative men in relation to the currency from my own section of the country:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned citizens of Rutherford County, Tennessee, would most respectfully represent that there is a great deficiency in the amount of currency required to remove the crops and carry on the commerce of the Southern States, which has produced a financial crisis, stagnating business of every description. Indeed, unless speedy relief is afforded by the national Government, a large majority of our citizens will be involved in bankruptcy.

We therefore pray that your honorable body authorize, by enactment, the Treasurer of the United States to increase the volume of currency by issuing, as early as practicable, at least five hundred millions of additional legal-tender notes.

Respectfully submitted.

NOTE.—The circulation of the State banks in the year 1862 has been obtained from page 210 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the banks at the commencement of the year 1863. The returns from Delaware, Maryland, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Kentucky were not complete. The aggregate amount of State bank circulation reported at the time was much greater than at any previous period.

APPENDIX C.

Report of Special Commissioner of the Revenue to Congress, December 17, 1869, pages 7 and 8, presents the following statistical facts in relation to the operations of railroads:

"An analysis of the railway system of the United States, which has been made for the first time during the past year,* presents us with results which, were they not founded on incontrovertible data, would seem fabulous. Thus the ratio of the gross earnings to cost of the railroads of the whole country for the year 1867 was equal to about 21 per cent.; for the Northern States about 23 per cent. The railroads of the country, therefore, now receive their cost in a little more than four years, and this ratio of gross earnings to cost is steadily increasing with the increase of the railway system and traffic of the country.

"Again, 'the average number of tons of freight carried upon the railroads of the country is estimated at 2,000 tons per mile of road. The tonnage of the railroads of Massachusetts, in 1867, equaled 3,812 tons per mile; that of the railroads of New York, 3,100 tons; and that of Pennsylvania, 6,000 tons. The gross tonnage of the 39,284 miles of railroad in existence at the close of 1867, at the above estimate, was equivalent to 78,568,000, and if we deduct from this amount 15,000,000 tons for coal and other cheap material, and an equal amount for duplications of the same tonnage on different roads, there will be left 48,488,000 tons of merchandise moved annually upon all the railways of the United States. At an estimated value of $150 per ton for this tonnage, the total annual value of the merchandise traffic of all the roads at present equals $7,273,200,000.'"

The total amount of tonnage transported on all the roads of the country for the year 1851 is estimated by good authorities at not exceeding 10,000,000 tons. If from this we deduct 3,000,000 tons for coal and other cheap materials, and 1,000,000 tons for duplications, there will be left a merchandise tonnage of 6,000,000 tons in 1851, against 48,488,000 tons in 1867. The rate of increase in this period, therefore, has been equal to £00 per cent., and the actual increase 42,488,000 tons. At the estimated value of $150 per ton, the increase in the value of the railway merchandise of the country in sixteen years has been $6,373,200,000, or at the rate of nearly $400,000,000 per annum. And it should also be noted that one-half of this total increase has taken place in the seven years that have elapsed since 1860.

The increased movement on the railways of the United States, which in the main represents increased product, also affords some indication of the progress of the development of the country. Thus, the earnings of the ten principal railway lines of the West exhibit for the first ten months of 1868 (with a decrease rather than an increase of freight rates) a gain of 8 per cent. as compared with earnings of the corresponding months for the year 1867. Taking also the movements on the railways and canals of the State of New York, which are known to be accurate, and at the same time accessible as a measure of comparison for the whole country, we find that the total annual tonnage increased from 7,138,917 tons in 1858, to 16,032,006 in 1868, an increase of 124 per cent.; while the annual value of the tonnage thus moved increased from $486,816,505 in 1858, to $1,723,336,207 in 1867, a gain of 254 per cent.

An examination of the railroad statistics of the whole country for the above period further indicates that during the ten years above referred to, or from 1858 to 1868, the increase of tonnage moved on the railways of the United States has been at a rate sixteen times greater than the ratio of the increase of population.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of an abundant crop, with all the manufacturing industries of the country employed to the full bent of their capacity; when nature had yielded to labor a more promising return than had ever before blessed this people—estimated by the billions, and nearly 20 per cent. in value over any of the preceding five years—the country was startled by a monetary crisis, as rapid in its career as it was fatal to individuals and sections. With much the same feeling as, when aroused from the deep slumbers of the night by the cry of fire, one beholds the destruction by the devouring element of the comforts and protection which years of toil have secured, were the great, patient, toiling masses of the people awakened to witness the disappearance and destruction of the fruits of their labor and their care, by an element as fatal and as devouring as that of fire.

The panic of September, 1873, swept away the great financial and banking firm which had carried the credit of the Government during a period as perilous, as momentous, and as great as ever drew upon the resources and faith of any government, and prostrated the fortunes of individuals by the thousand, and in the shrinkage in price if not in values, it caused to the products of the South and West, and the manufactures of the entire country, estimated by the hundreds of millions, will make an epoch in the monetary history of the world, the study of which will form material for thought and instruction for years to come. However, its immediate effect and lesson is upon us and the people we represent. The consequences of the panic, in its derangement of business, in shrinkage in values, in its loss of confidence, all manifested in the countless thousands of laborers and their families, who, being without bread, or the employment to make it, appeal to charity; in the stoppage of small industries, in the penurious and straitened condition of the agricultural laborers alike in the cotton-fields of the South and the grain-fields of the West, in the depths of the burden felt by all classes, caused by the support of their national, State, and local governments, are the facts we have to confront. And in the midst of this financial distress there come to us two voices: One from those who were the direct agents and actors in producing it, many of whom derived profit and commission from its dire agonies and misfortunes, and all of whom used for their own relief the agencies they would now deny to the great mass of the people. From that great mass comes the other voice; it is alike a wail, a protest, and a demand—a wail for the ruin by which they are either surrounded or threatened, a protest against the means by which it was produced, and a demand for relief and protection against its disasters and against its recurence.

Profoundly surprised must the people be to learn that when they demand currency for their relief, they are to be informed by those bankers who demanded and coerced the Secretary of the Treasury into the purchase of fourteen millions of bonds in order to get the currency then in the Treasury, and who persuaded him to cut loose the forty-four million reserve, and who, not content with these questionable proceedings, openly violated the law and created millions of dollars of currency in certified checks, in order to bridge over the peril by which they and their immediate favorites were environed, that they, the people, do not need it. And while by these agencies they have in a great measure escaped the ravages of the storm, yet away far from them, among the producers and laborers in the real field of wealth where now the storm holds high carnival of ruin and bankruptcy, no such shelter as they have used shall be provided for the people. That currency (illegally got and illegally manufactured) saved the East and New York, and was a healthful medicine for the banks and brokers, yet it is poison to the South, the West, and the people.

Sir, let us recur to the protest of the people against the agencies by which this financial distress was produced, and then inquire into and meet their demand for relief against its disasters and protection against its recurrence.

By what agencies has this financial distress been produced? I answer without hesitation, it proceeded directly from the system of banking and currency created by your laws.

Turn with me for a moment to that system. Briefly stated, our currency is supposed to consist: first, of gold and silver, which pay all debts or dues, public and private; secondly, of Treasury notes, which pay all debts, public and private, and a portion only of public dues; thirdly, national-bank notes, which is a tolerated currency, and pays debts to each united association and a portion of the public dues, but is not a legal tender in payment of private debts.

Gold and silver practically do not now perform any of the offices of currency; they are by a less valuable material driven from the courses and channels of trade among the people. The national-bank notes, being redeemable by law in the Treasury or legal-tender notes, a certain portion of the legal-tenders must be held as a reserve for this purpose of redemption. And being made of value for that purpose, the moment, almost, that the debtors of a banking institution demand payment, this reserve being diminished, contraction results. And if the moment is one of distrust, it becomes a moment of bankruptcy. This being so, it is possible to make corners, which force these moments of distrust and bankruptcy upon the country. This condition of the currency and this regulation put it in the power of the speculators in the labor and in the real wealth of the country to dictate the price of labor, the value of its products, and to control the wealth of the country, and to diminish the revenues of the Government, national and State, and in so doing to increase the weight and burden of taxation.

It is said, and I will not gainsay its truth, that wild, hazardous speculation, tended to, if it did not precipitate, the panic. But what caused this wild, hazardous, speculative spirit? Turn again to your banking laws, which require the country banks, so called, to have in the redemption cities a portion of their reserve. What is the effect of this? The country banks keep on deposit in New York City an excess of this amount and with such banks as pay the most interest. The amount of the reserve is required to be kept at all hazards. The New York banks do not permit it to lie idle; but being liable to call, it is loaned, not to legitimate trade, but loaned on call at high rates of interest. These high rates of interest cannot be paid by the honest trader, for honest traders cannot afford to pay it, but are paid by the speculator and gambler, who depends upon his ingenuity or rascality for such returns as will enable him to pay it. So wild and reckless has this spirit of speculation become, that it recks not of national honor, only as a source of profit; of national life, only as a means of luxury; of individual fortunes, only as a matter of gain and triumph; of sympathy for human suffering, of pride in human happiness, there is none. All this is encouraged, and has the sanction of your present system of currency and banking.

Are these idle and unsustained statements? No. They are supported by the proof, which I read you from the Comptroller of the Currency in his last report, who says:

> The national currency act requires that the country banks shall hold 6 per cent., the redemption cities 12½ per cent., and the New York City banks 25 per cent. of their liabilities in cash, making an aggregate of cash reserve of from 13 to 15 per cent. The remainder of the reserve required to be held by the country banks may be on deposit with the banks in the redemption cities, while that of the redemption cities may be on deposit in the city of New York.
> These large accumulations in the redemption cities, and in the banks of the city of New York, are to a large extent invested in call loans, the banks in the redemption cities and in the city of New York having no resource like the joint-stock banks of England in which to place their surplus of reserves, which can be readily converted in the markets of the world into coin, if occasion shall require; and it can hardly be doubted that if the surplus means of the country banks, which were invested in call loans by their city correspondents, had been invested in funds convertible into cash upon demand, the disastrous results of the late panic would have been largely avoided.
> The crisis was caused in a great degree by the desire of the country banks to withdraw their balances from the city banks: first, because in the month of September the amount on deposit with the city banks was needed for the legitimate purposes of trade; and secondly, because the country banks, foreseeing and fearing the return of the experience of previous years, thought it safer to withdraw their balances at once. When the reserves of the New York City banks became alarmingly reduced by the drafts of their country correspondents, the only resource left to the city banks was to convert their call loans, amounting to some $60,000,000; but these, if paid at all, were paid in checks upon the associated banks, and the latter found, the next morning, at the clearing-house, that, although a portion of their liabilities had been reduced by the payment of call loans, they were in the aggregate no richer in currency than on the previous day. Suspension followed.

And again, on page 23, the Comptroller, quoting from a previous report, says:

> The reserves of the nineteen hundred national banks located elsewhere than in the city of New York are held to a great extent in that city. For most of the time during the past year an amount equal to more than one-fifth of the capital of all these national banks has been held on deposit by the national banks of the city of New York to the credit of their correspondents. In many cases these credits amount to twice the capital of the bank with which they are deposited; in other cases the amount of deposits is three, four, and even five times the capital, which amount has been attracted thither largely by the payment of interest on deposits. The failure of one of these New York City banks in a time of monetary stringency would embarrass, if not ruin, many banks in the redemption cities, and, in turn, the country correspondents of these banks would suffer from the imprudence of the New York bank, which would be responsible for wide-spread disaster. * * *

In times of excessive stringency loans are not made by such associations to business men upon commercial paper, but to dealers in speculative securities, upon short time, at high rates of interest; and an increase of call loans beyond the proper limit is more likely to afford facilities for unwarrantable stock speculations than relief to legitimate business transactions. * * * * *

The variations in the liabilities requiring reserve in the banks of the city of New York are very great. The banks outside of New York, during the dull season, send their surplus means to that city for deposit upon interest, to await the revival of business. The banks in the city of New York, at such periods of the year, have no legitimate outlet for these funds, and are therefore threatened with loss. The stock board takes advantage of this condition of affairs, speculation is stimulated by the cheapness of money, and a market is found for the idle funds upon doubtful collaterals, and the result is seen in the increased transactions at the clearing-house, which, during the past year, exceeded $32,000,000,000, or an average of more than $100,000,000 daily—not one-half of which was the result of legitimate business; the total amount of transactions being greater than that of the bankers' clearing-house of the city of London. The evil arises largely from the payment by the banks of interest on deposits, an old-established custom which cannot easily be changed by direct legislation.

Again he says, on page 28:

The present financial crisis may in a great degree be attributed to the intimate relations of the banks of the city of New York with the transactions of the stock board, more than one-fourth, and in many instances nearly one-third, of the bills receivable of the banks, since the late civil war, having consisted of demand loans to brokers and members of the stock board, which transactions have a tendency to impede and unsettle, instead of facilitating, the legitimate business interests of the whole country. Previous to the war the stock board is said to have consisted of only one hundred and fifty members, and its organic principle was a strictly commission business, under a stringent and conservative constitution and by-laws. The close of the war found the membership of the stock board increased to eleven hundred, and composed of men from all parts of the country, many of whom had congregated in Wall street, adopting for their rule of business the apt motto of Horace, "Make money; make it honestly if you can; at all events make money." The law of the State of New York, restricting the operations of the stock board, which had been retained on the statute-book since 1813, had, unfortunately, been repealed in 1858, so that its members and manipulators were enabled to increase their operations to a gigantic scale.

Again, says the late Secretary of the Treasury, now a Senator of the United States, in a recent speech delivered in the Senate:

The processes by which the currency of the city of New York was inflated are generally well understood. The statistics show that the deposits of the banks of the city of New York, including the national banks and the banks established under the laws of the State, were increased $50,000,000 between the month of April and the month of September. Four banks in that city were indebted during a portion of that period of time to the extent of more than $50,000,000. The presence of this vast sum of money in New York, accumulated by unnatural processes, brought upon that city, and then upon the whole country secondarily, the evils which we are now called to consider.

If, therefore, anything can be inferred from the experience of the last autumn it is this: that the accumulation of currency in the city of New York by artificial means produced an inflation of the currency in that city, led to speculations, to excitement, disaster, and ruin.

I repeat, sir, that the panic of September, 1873, is the direct consequence of the existing banking and currency laws. There is yet one view of the immense danger that lies in it that it seems to me has not fully been weighed and cared for by those who have charge of the present bill, or by those who look to a continuance of national-bank notes as a portion of the currency. The national-bank note is redeemable in legal-tenders or gold. Of gold there is none for purposes of redemption. Of legal-tenders there is, say, an equal amount to the national-bank notes. Now, let distrust, want of confidence, or any other cause, start the process of redemption with the banks, and we have seen it is likely to occur, and the Treasury note is sought for because of its higher functions. The national banks must hold every legal-tender note, and their own notes, as they may receive or collect them; the legal-tender to pay in redemption, and their own to prevent immediate demand for redemption. The first result is, that both amounts are being contracted; the legal-tender in being hoarded, and the national-bank note in being retired. The second result is, that when confidence is shaken in these institutions, a rapid, severe, and large contraction takes place, fatal in immediate disaster and bankruptcy. The amount of legal-tenders, the redemption agent, is not created by labor or toil. No such agency can add to its amount; that is fixed by your arbitrary laws and may be bought, secured, and controlled by those who are willing to laugh at your fears and mock at your calamities.

Again, if the immense sum of money under the name of reserves, which is drawn from the country banks into New York and other redemption cities, was permitted or compelled to remain with the country banks, the tendency would be first to discourage speculation, and secondly to encourage the growth of producing wealth.

If the cotton-planter, the tobacco-producer, and the grain-grower were enabled to select the time and place of selling, instead of having both, in a great measure under the present banking system, dictated by brokers in New York, the profits of the market in lieu of passing into the pockets of the broker would pass into those of the farmer and planter.

Again, it is possible that the idea of redemption agencies in the large centers of trade was originated under the belief that the day was not distant when national-bank notes would be convertible into coin; but that is a delusion—an event not likely to happen during the continuance of the present foreign indebtedness of the United States, and the several States and local corporations thereof. Assuming, without now arguing this proposition, that, for years to come, redemption of national-bank notes with legal-tenders is to be the policy of the country, that is, if national-bank notes are to continue as a part of the currency, what is its practical operation upon the region of country represented by the country banks? It is to take just that amount of legal-tender notes away from its business; and this brings me to the objection to the existing banking laws in this distribution of the bank capital, which is unequal and unjust. Its inequality, together with the requirement that a large proportion of the currency which the producing sections of the country have must be hoarded by the country banks in the redemption cities, makes the laborer and producer subject to the interest and policy of the trader and speculator of the eastern cities. This inequality and injustice is made manifest in the present plethoric condition of the eastern cities, which have drawn unto themselves at diminished prices the substance and fatness of the South and West, and is further attested by the earnest appeals that come from the laboring classes in all the producing States showing their distressed condition.

But, referring to this inequality of banking capital and circulation among the sections of the Union, let us look at the naked facts as they are. It appears, from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Southern and Southwestern States had of banking circulation in 1862 the sum of $71,098,408, or $6.17 per capita. In 1873 they had the sum of but $38,160,308, or $2.91 per capita. The Eastern or New England States had of banking capital in 1862 $65,516,155, or $20.90 per capita. In 1873 they had the sum of $110,489,966, or $31.68 per capita. Since 1862 the negroes have become free laborers and larger consumers, and in every point of view this fact demands for that section a larger amount of currency. There has not been any destruction of lands, and no real diminution in population in these States since 1862. The value of the annual yield of labor in grain, tobacco, cotton, &c., will show that, notwithstanding the war, and its effects upon individuals in those States, yet the wealth, the population, and the industry, that needs at least as much, if not more currency than was used in 1862, is there. But I beg to call attention to a further comparison, exhibiting the gross injustice of the present distribution of banking capital, and, taken in connection with the requirements of the banking law already referred to, makes manifest why the West and South are hewers of wood and drawers of water to the East. I exhibit here a table showing the population of the New England States, and the value of their real and personal property, and then the amount of their banking circulation; and then in juxtaposition exhibit a table showing the population of the Southern, Southwestern, and Western States, the value of their real and personal property, and then the amount of their banking circulation:

It will be seen that while the population of the West and South exceeds that of New England twenty millions, and their real and personal property exceeds that of these States over eight millions, as shown by the census of 1870, from which I have quoted, yet New England stands equal in bank circulation. Six States equal to twenty-three! Three millions of population in the East equal to twenty-four millions in the West! The same accommodation to four millions of wealth in the East that you extend to twelve hundred and a half millions in the South and West! It would seem that the mere statement of the inequality would demonstrate its injustice; but learned men in finance, and gentlemen of the East versed in the courses of money, say that neither capital nor circulation would go South or West, because you have no capital. If you, say they, had the chance, you have no capital to put into bonds, either as banking capital for issue or discount.

I pause for a moment to test this. Will you take away the tax upon local bank issues? Will you consent that the seventy millions of excess shall be withdrawn from New England and placed for disposal at the West and South? Will you consent, as I shall hereafter argue is the best solution of our present financial difficulties, that the national-bank notes shall be retired, and in lieu thereof legal-tender notes shall be issued? No; none of these will be accepted by Eastern Representatives or Eastern bankers. Your failure to do so shows you do not believe we are without capital, but that you appreciate the power of the vast monopoly you enjoy over the currency of the country. But have we of the West and South capital and wealth? I do not propose to stop at the questions asked and draw inferences from them, but to solicit those who deny it to us, to answer what is wealth, and what is capital. The best definition of wealth ever yet given is, that it is labor. Capital is accumulated property, represented in lands, houses, personalty, bonds, &c. Of these, lands, houses, and personalty may be said to be useful capital. A bond has been defined to be "capital to him who holds it and a tax to every one else." In the South and West we have an abundance of labor; we have lands, houses, personalty, all the means of wealth and all the evidences of useful capital. It belongs to the orator and the poet to describe in appropriate speech its splendor, its magnificence, its extent, and its quantity; to me, the humbler task to invite you to reflect for a moment upon the immense trade of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, the growth of railroads and of cities, the increase in farms and in manufactures, and point to the facts exhibited in your return of exports. While these sections clothe and feed the millions of the East and North, yet they are able to furnish over three-fourths of the exports of the country.

I submit to you a statement of the exports of the United States for the fiscal year 1873.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS, February 9, 1874.

EDWARD YOUNG,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. W. C. WHITTHORNE, M. C.

Look to the values of cotton, grain, tobacco, gold and silver, and what little of either that may be the products of the States, other than the South and West, are more than balanced by the manufactured and unmanufactured goods exported from these States. A wonderful exhibit this of the productive industry and wealth of the country, its real capital, refuting incontestably the allegation that we have no wealth or capital. It is the vast bank from which is drawn the main support of your Government and its people. And yet, when this immense country, with all of its industrial and commercial pursuits, is made to pay tribute under the regulations of your banking system to those who are far distant in sympathy and interest from them, by a monopoly whose power and influence are almost without a parallel in commercial history, I submit it is most grievous and unjust.

One of the ablest political economists and statesmen America ever produced said, in terse and forcible words which by their strength commend themselves to the approval of every reflecting mind:

> Can that favor equality which gives to one portion of the citizens and the country, decided advantages over the other? * * * Can that be favorable to liberty which concentrates the money power, and places it under the control of a few powerful and wealthy individuals? It is the remark of a profound statesman, that the revenue is the state. And of course those who control the revenue control the state; and those who control the money power can the revenue, and through it, the state, with the property and industry of the country in all its ramifications. Let us pause for a moment and reflect on the nature and extent of this tremendous power.
> Place the money power in the hands of a single individual, or a combination of individuals, and they by expanding or contracting the currency may raise or sink prices at pleasure; and by purchasing when at the greatest depression and selling at the greatest elevation, may command the whole property and industry of the community and control its fiscal operations. * * * Never was an engine invented better calculated to place the destiny of the many in the hands of the few, or less favorable to that equality and independence which lie at the bottom of our free institutions.

You first fix by law the amount of your national-bank currency; you then fix by law the amount and kind of currency in which it is redeemable; you fix by law the places of its redemption, and abstract this amount from the fields of production, and in doing this prefer one section in the distribution of currency; thus logically and purposely placing the money power of the nation in the hands of these parties and this section. And, sir, need I point now—in view of the agency of eastern capitalists in producing the panic and their control of the deposits of the country banks—to the results, an embarrassed Treasury, shrinkage in prices, broken fortunes, closed workshops, and unemployed labor, proving to-day the truth that the money power "may command the whole property and industry of the community and control its fiscal operations?"

Dare I go further, and say here, sir, with parliamentary propriety, that they control the legislation of the country? The counsel of those whose business, whose education and interest, it has been and is to increase the value of money at the expense of labor has been freely tendered, if not sought for; but those whose desire and interest it is to increase the price of labor and their products have had no paid counsel or attorneys before us. They, the masses, in their honest faith, rely upon us, their public Representatives in this House. Shall we emancipate them and their labor from this thralldom and serfdom, more powerful and exacting in its requirements of tribute and service than any form of feudalism that ever existed?

I deem it appropriate, here and in this connection, to refer to the "savings-banks," so called, as a part of the monetary system of the country. "Bank deposits," through agency of drafts and checks, form a large part of the currency of the country. The protection of depositors, and through them this part of the currency of the country, does not seem to have secured that care and attention upon the part of local Legislatures and the authors of the present national banking system which the importance of the large amount of individual deposits demanded.

Turning to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, made to the present session of Congress, I find the aggregate amount of individual deposits in the savings-banks of eight States to be $663,244,179; and the individual deposits in the national banks, (September 12, 1873,) to be $622,685,563. Now, estimating the individual deposits in the savings and other banks of the remaining twenty-nine States to be equal to one-third of the amount given for the savings-banks of the eight States, and you have a grand total of about $1,500,000,000 of individual deposits, which, through the agency I speak of, form a portion of the currency of the country.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that land, houses, bonds, and mortgages are the capital of the rich, while currency is the capital of labor and of the poor. The value of your land, houses, mortgages, and bonds, this form of capital, depends upon the value and health of labor. Currency, then, being the capital of labor, it is a high duty of the legislator to see that that "currency" should be full, healthy, and life-giving, not life-destroying.

I pause for a moment to ask your reflection upon previous bank suspensions, monetary crises, and panics, more particularly in this country; that they, as well as this one, were precipitated and attended by a want of confidence by the depositor, and a want of ability in the banking institutions to meet the demand of the depositor; that while the panic of 1873 was not accompanied with so much distrust of the currency, yet the solvent banking institutions of 1873 had no power by the issue of bank-notes or currency to meet local or individual demands for relief, as was the case in other panics, except in localities where certified checks were made use of. The want of security to the depositor reaches far beyond him, and extends to the great public, and the failure to give it is a serious dereliction of duty, injurious in its consequences.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to present what I regard as the abuses and evils of our existing banking and currency system, against which the people rightfully protest, and from which they demand relief.

Sir, before we consider the measures of relief proposed, let us look to the condition of the country. With a national, State, and municipal debt of $3,275,239,130 in 1870, and which has not (though slightly in the national) in the grand total decreased since then; with a railroad debt of $1,511,578,944, making a total aggregating nearly five billions of dollars; with a large amount of individual indebtedness, a part of which is represented by millions among the assets of the banks, and when you regard this immense load, think further that this people, so indebted, pay annually for the support of their national, State, and municipal governments, in round numbers, $700,000,000; and as you take in the picture of the condition of the country, reflect that the interest on our bonds, national, State, railroad, and municipal, payable each year to the holders resident in Europe, exceeds the annual production of gold and silver in the whole world, you must realize that the proposition of immediate resumption of specie payments, either by the Government or the banks, is utterly idle. Equally idle is resumption at an early day.

I am one of those, however, allow me to say, who believe gold and silver are properly the currency of the world, and the basis of all credit money in all well-regulated commercial countries; and that they are and have been wisely fixed by the experience of the world as the proper standard of value. They are the only fair representative and just currency for labor; and I further believe they are the currency contemplated by the framers of our Constitution. But in view of the decision of the Supreme Court recognizing legal-tender notes as money; in view of past legislation; in view of the fact that gold and silver have been expelled from our trade as currency; in view of the indebtedness of the country as I have shown; in view of the embarrassed condition of labor and the shrinkage in the values of property; in view of the immense load of taxation resting upon the shoulders of the laborer and producer, it is simple mockery to talk now to the people and advise them to adjust their debts and pay their taxes in gold, or to hope and believe it can be done at an early date.

Resumption of specie payments is, however, the goal to which the statesmen of the country, who would do justice to labor and industry, would lead our finances. But how is it to be done, and when? The money centers, the banks and bankers, the bondholder, and the speculator, plethoric with currency, all seem united in the suggestion that it is to be done by payment of the present issues of legal-tenders in specie or in a bond bearing interest payable in gold. To pay in gold is impossible. Then, to reduce the proposition, it is one to add from twenty to twenty-five million dollars per annum (the interest upon $400,000,000 of our present debt now non-interest bearing) to the present amount of taxes paid by the people, and then leave, as the volume of paper currency, the amount of issues authorized by law to the present national banks—being a contraction of $400,000,000—and a concentration of the money power in the hands of the banks of New York and New England! How fearful and dangerous this power over the labor, industry, and property of the country! How vast, stupendous, and far-reaching the monopoly! Shall we, under the delusion that we are returning to specie payments, surrender the liberties of the people, their labor, and their wealth, to the tender mercies of these monopolists. Resumption and contraction, in view of the peculiar relations of legal-tender notes to the national-bank notes, mean to increase the purchasing power of national-bank notes, with the corresponding effect to decrease the price of labor and the value of property. Can you make anything else of the proposition? Grant it and act upon it. Increased taxation follows; all values sink; labor seeks in vain for its reward; bankruptcy ensues, and universal distress prevails. Results we dare not face; results we should not precipitate upon the country.

But grant that the legal-tender is the promise to pay of the Government; when? Is the holder demanding payment? If he does, what injustice is done him by inability or refusal to pay? Is he not a citizen of the country, and if he says that he is losing interest, does he seek to avoid the payment of his proportion of the expenses of Government by turning his capital into a bond to escape taxation? If such is his purpose, I for one do not propose to aid him, regarding that provision of law that exempts bonds from taxation as unjust, if not unconstitutional. Yet, again, grant that the issue of more currency tends to cheapen the currency already in existence, and to elevate the prices of property and labor, and that evil is likely to flow from inflation; yet the dangers from this source are not equal, or so momentous in consequences, as those that will arise from the proposed measures of contraction. An increase of the volume of currency beyond the legitimate demands of trade and population is ever attended with destructive results, and hence I would avoid, if possible, this mistake.

I am brought now, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of the questions as to how much currency we have, and how much is demanded by the trade and population of the United States.

Your paper currency and legislation, and the state of your foreign indebtedness, have driven gold and silver away; and they are not to be reckoned in any estimates that may be made as to the amount, except so far as it appears in the States of Texas and California and among the miners.

I quote from the report of the Comptroller, who, after writing his annual report, says in a note that—

Since writing the above the following statement has been prepared, showing the whole amount of national-bank currency, legal-tender notes, and fractional currency issued up to October 12 and November 1, 1875:

Class.	October 13.	November 1.
National-bank currency	$350, 049, 056	$350, 332, 884
Legal-tender notes	359, 566, 888	360, 952, 206
Fractional currency	46, 699, 191	47, 876, 149
Totals	756, 315, 135	759, 161, 239
Deduct amounts held by the Treasury and by banks	116, 496, 997	128, 140, 727
Which will leave unaccounted for	639, 818, 138	631, 020, 512

After making due allowance for the currency held by State and savings banks, trust companies, and private bankers, these are larger amounts than can be supposed to have been in the pockets of men or the tills of small dealers. But it may be left to the ingenious in such matters to divine what portion thereof was hoarded by the timid, the ignorant, or the covetous.

That is to say, that upon the 1st day of November last there was nominally in circulation the sum of $631,020,512, leaving "the ingenious" "to divine what portion was hoarded by the timid, the ignorant, or the covetous." Shall we be far wrong, sir, to divine that the savings-banks, State banks, and bankers, together with the timid and ignorant—these latter classes, being largely debtors, knowing only that the Treasury note would pay all debts but customs dues—had hoarded over two hundred millions of this amount? Shall we make a mistake, sir, when we divine that a large percentage of this amount has been lost and destroyed since issued? In fine, sir, looking to the fact that the first and continuing effect of the panic was a famine of currency, relieved in the redemption cities and other money centers, at first by "certified checks" and then by drawing from country customers, are we not safe in "divining" that among the honest traders, laborers, producers, and manufacturers, there was but little, if any, more than four hundred millions of currency upon the 1st of November last? I venture the opinion that no statistician or statesman, who values his work or his opinion, can estimate it at a higher figure. No statesman, financier, or trader will estimate this sum as sufficient for the trade, commerce, and population of the United States. But it is said this contraction was spasmodic and temporary; that the present law authorizes—

Legal-tender notes	356, 000, 000
National-bank issue	354, 000, 000
Making a total of	760, 000, 000

And that is with the circulation of gold and silver in the States referred to about $20 per capita, and is a sufficient volume. I am ready to concede this if the amount was in circulation, but it is seen that under your banking law the reserve is kept constantly out of circulation. This we may estimate at $150,000,000. The national-bank issue is kept afloat and retired at the will of the banks, and not at the will of the laborers and producers, so that I submit it is entirely safe to assume that the actual circulation under authority of law does not and cannot exceed materially the sum of $650,000,000, or about $16 per capita, and the control of that under your partial legislation and system not left to industry, but to favored individuals. This sum per capita is not enough for the people of the United States.

I find upon turning to a recent report made by the able Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Edward Young, that he gives for Great Britain a total circulation, coin and notes, of £141,239,000, equivalent in United States gold coin to $686,421,540; and says:

The population of the United Kingdom as determined by the census of 1871 was 31,877,108. Assuming this number to have been increased to 32,000,000 by the end of 1872, the average amount of currency per capita circulating in the United Kingdom at the later date was about equal to $21.45 in United States gold coin, or about $23.60 in our paper currency.

For France, after giving details which show the amount of circulation, he gives a total as follows: "Currency circulation 7,047,627,206, (in francs,) "equivalent," he says, "in United States gold coin, at 20 cents to the franc, to $1,209,545,441; or, if computed at United States Treasury notes, (19.3 cents to the franc,) to $1,167,200,000." The population of France is about 36,000,000, giving of circulation about $32 per capita.

For North Germany, after giving details which show the amount of circulation, he presents a total as follows:

Coin and notes in the hands of the people, 785,594,504 thalers, equivalent in United States gold coin to $557,772,097.84.

He says:

The population of North Germany in 1867 was 29,906,217. Assuming it to have been 30,000,000 at the date to which the above statement refers, the average amount of currency per capita was equal to about $18.60 in United States gold, or about $20.64 in our currency when gold is worth a premium of 11 per cent.

These countries are the wealthiest in all the arts and industries of civilization, and have found it necessary to supply to their trade, commerce, and labor more, and I add a better circulation per capita than does this Government. Since the discovery of the gold mines of California and Australia, and the silver mines of our mountains, the rate of circulation per capita has been on a steady and strong increase in all commercial and civilized countries.

The circulation of the United States in 1860 was, as per statement of Mr. Chase, $477,000,000, or over $15 per capita. Since then our growth in population, the extension of cultivated territory, the wonderful increase of the products of the farm and of manufacturing establishments, the rapid and powerful multiplication of the channels of trade and commerce, as exhibited by the tables of our commerce, manufactures, and railroads, which I have before me but have not time to read, but whose wonderful truths are told in the simple exhibit that our national wealth in 1860 was $16,159,616,068; and in a short decade, which witnessed the most gigantic civil war recorded in the annals of time, carrying with loss of life the destruction of billions of property, we behold an increase in national wealth of $14,000,000,000, the total national wealth in 1870 being $30,068,518,507. And when we reflect that in France, Great Britain, and North Germany, where land is held by families not transferred for centuries; that commercial and manufacturing establishments become respected with age, making a credit that answers all the purposes of currency; that their population is dense and compassed within a narrow territory, with facilities for exchange within almost any given ten miles square; that the experience of these countries dictates from $20 to $25 per capita as the needed amount of circulation, it would seem that with our lands, from the rapidity and ease with which they are transferable; with mobility the feature of our commerce and manufactures; with our population diffused and extending over an area of territory exceeding that of civilized Europe; with such lack of facilities of exchange that for months the bank-note or legal-tender ceases its office of circulation, resting in the pockets of laborers and producers far distant from the channels of trade and commerce, it seems too clear for argument that our present banking and currency laws do not furnish the supply of circulation demanded by our trade and population.

If the nominal amount of our currency was emancipated from its legislative restrictions and the control of individuals, (which control is secured by the law itself,) I am inclined to believe it would not be far from the amount demanded by a healthy condition of labor and trade, and particularly if that currency ceases to be the creation of individuals.

I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believe that it is alone the province of the "sovereign power" to coin money, and that the right or authority to do so should not be delegated to any class; but, without arguing such points, I address myself to the immediate question, can we, without the evils of inflation or the dangers of contraction, so reform our currency as to give the needed supply, and ultimately reach the point where labor will dictate its own value, and commerce be relieved of unjust exactions by a representative circulating medium, recognized by the world in its experiences of the past and its wisdom of the present, as the only just standard of value? In my opinion it can be done; and that is by retiring the national-bank note, and substituting in lieu of it the legal-tender note. This will give the people the full benefit of the present nominal amount of the currency, since the necessity of any reserve will not exist, and all legislative restrictions upon the currency can be well dispensed with.

The advantage of uniformity will give health, and a provision that the legal-tender shall be receivable in payment of all dues to the Government except so much gold per annum as may be demanded by the legal obligations of the Government will give value to them. This will form the cheapest and best paper currency the present condition of the country will admit of. This work of substitution can be rapidly performed, and without prejudice to the industrial pursuits and trades of the country; and in my opinion can be done so as to relieve the people of a large amount of interest per annum, without violating any of the obligations of the Government. It will give a sense of security and certainty to the business interests of the country, that will at once lift up and give new life to the energies of the people; it will enable you, by retiring small notes, at a near future day to put into the pockets of the people that amount of gold and silver necessary for the adjustment of the wages of daily labor, and this will form the basis of confidence in all our business transactions. And after this step, as your public debt decreases and your means of paying taxes increase, you can glide into that condition of finances that will enable the Government to pay on demand in gold such notes as the interest or convenience of the public may desire to be converted.

Already, sir, have I extended my remarks too far for the patience of the House. I have said enough to indicate my general views upon the reforms demanded in our currency. I have but to add that, in addition to the amount of currency, the adoption of the legal-tender note would give, being about $800,000,000, I would further authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay any bond of the United States of any series in legal-tender notes to be issued for that purpose. My own views in favor of paying the five-twenty bonds in legal-tenders I need not now press upon the consideration of the House, being satisfied that an overwhelming majority differs with me in that regard.

It will be seen that I regard the questions presented by the currency agitation as solvable into these plain, practical ones:

Shall the four hundred millions of non-interest-bearing debt be converted into an interest-bearing debt? Contraction and resumption mean this.

Shall the purchasing and interest-increasing power of the monopoly in money be added to and perpetuated? A continuance of national-bank notes means this.

Shall the labor of the country be emancipated from its serfdom to the speculators and money-changers of the East?

Escaping from the intricacies and thralldom of a currency of a class that controls the values of property at its will, shall the industry and production of the country dictate its own prices and its own rewards?

Entertaining these views, and believing that the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency, as reported, tends to increase and perpetuate the present national banking monopoly, with all its unjust discrimination against the West and South, with its power over the labor and property of the country, and that its principles and details are in the interest of capital as against labor, and that valid objections as to the power and policy of Congress to charter and protect by national sanction every broker and note shaver in the country exist, and that its passage will eventuate in the conversion of the non-interest-bearing debt of the Government (being the four hundred millions of greenbacks) into an interest-bearing debt, I cannot yield it my support without material amendment.

If the present national banking system, with circulation, is to be continued, I submit that the just complaints of the country demand these reformatory features, namely:

First. Some security for the depositor.

Secondly. Prohibition against payment of interest on deposits.

Thirdly. Some protection against usurious rates of interest.

Fourthly. An equal distribution of banking capital.

Believing, Mr. Speaker, that the prosperity of the country, the content of its laboring classes, the reduction of taxes, and the easy and ultimate payment of the public debt are only to be secured by a sound currency; and, upon the other hand, that a vicious currency will corrupt the courses of trade, leading to gambling and speculation, will prostrate the industries of the country, perpetuate its debt, increase taxation, and involve the fate of popular institutions, I have but firmly to say, that in the present condition of the country and its finances I see no safe way to relieve its embarrassments and to secure a sound currency except through the adoption of the greenback currency as against the national-bank note.

Mr. BECK. I wish to give notice that at the proper time, if an opportunity occurs, I will offer the amendment to the bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk. Of course there can be no action on the bill to-day; but I want the amendment read so that when the proper time comes I may offer it, my object being to put a tax of 3 per cent. on the circulation of national banks instead of 1 per cent. per annum I believe they ought to pay that much for the privilege of being furnished with currency by the Government. My proposition will add $6,600,000 annually to the revenues of the country, from a source much better able to bear it than many sources from which we now collect it are.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Add as an additional section:

That from and after the passage of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a tax of ¼ of one per cent. per month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money, but not including that in the vault of the bank, or redeemed and on deposit for said bank; and all provisions of existing law in conflict with the foregoing provisions are hereby repealed.

Mr. BUCKNER said: Mr. Speaker, I am fully persuaded that many members of this Congress, especially from the country north of the Potomac and east of the Alleghanies and Lake Erie, have no adequate conception of the real condition of the great agricultural and planting sections of the country. I do not believe that they begin to appreciate the sufferings of the farmers of the West, and of course they are not prepared to administer any appropriate remedy, or to admit that they need any change in the policy of the Government or any relief by the action of this Congress. They seem to be laboring under the unfortunate delusion that the whole country has been on a grand financial and monetary spree, and that the only cure for the patient is to let him sober off—it matters not at how much cost to his health or peril to his life. They seem to think, when they have hunted up some false and specious explanation of the panic of last fall, and they can announce that money is easy in New York and other money centers, everything is again lovely and the country is once more on the high-road to prosperity.

That I am not mistaken as to the prevalence of this opinion among those who parade their opinions before the public, I beg to read some extracts from a speech lately delivered by the ex-Secretary of the Treasury. After stating that his policy of contraction was the policy of the country, he says:

We have passed through—I say "through"—a financial difficulty. That financial "difficulty" has no doubt taught us a lesson. As a lesson it is to be considered, as a teacher it is to be respected; but as a dictator, or as a reason for abandoning a policy that has been tried, or as a reason for entering upon a policy which has not been tried, it is the most dangerous of authorities.

He continues to say that "the recent 'difficulty' neither is nor has been serious in its general results;" and after attributing the panic to the inflation of the currency locally, he says that the city of "New York from the month of April to December, was a living and vivid illustration of the evils of an inflated currency, whether affecting a city, a State, or the nation itself."

I do not propose to controvert these assertions of the ex-Secretary. I only call attention to them to confirm my proposition that gentlemen from the creditor and favored section of the country seem to be content when they have given an explanation of the "financial difficulty," however trite or superficial it may be.

In the same speech the distinguished ex-Secretary thus speaks of the condition of the country:

I believe that the country has never, from the beginning of the Government, enjoyed five years of such undisturbed prosperity as it has during the last five years. And if it be true, as the Senator from Georgia has asserted, that there is an absence of prosperity in the South, I apprehend from the observations I have been able to make that it is due to circumstances entirely independent of the policy of the Government.

As evidence of the prosperity of the agriculturists of the South he refers to the increase of population in a few of the cities of the South, and with equal reason and as sound logic he might be able to prove that the farmers of the West are growing rich because they have occasionally, and in a few localities, burned corn for fuel.

In a speech delivered on this floor by an honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WILBER] there is such a vein of contentment and satisfaction running through it, and especially with that monster of monstrosities, the national banking system, that I must ask the Clerk to read it:

The Clerk read as follows:

In fact, there are so many different ideas presented there is danger of doing too much. The country is now prosperous; we have passed over the panic of last fall; and I believe we cannot at this time make any better banking law than we now have. We have tried it. The people had more confidence in national-bank bills last fall than in banks or business firms. They chose rather to hoard them up than loan to banks or business firms with interest. Furthermore, I will guarantee that not a member here can tell what bank a single bill is on which he has in his pocket.

Mr. BUCKNER. The venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] in a labored and well-prepared speech on the late panic, delivered some weeks ago, accounts for it in great part by overtrading, and says that the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., and the stoppage of payment by banks and bankers of New York, were effects and not causes. I entirely concur in the opinion that the panic was but an effect, and not a cause, of the failure of the speculating bankers of New York; but I utterly deny that overtrading, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or local inflation at New York, the theory of the ex-Secretary of the Treasury, either singly or combined, has produced the condition of things in the South and West of which we complain. Either solution of the panic, or "financial difficulty," is as superficial as it is deceptive and unsatisfactory. The local inflation at New York, and the overtrading, if any has existed, are alike effects of a cause that lies far back and beyond.

The panic of last fall was the legitimate and logical result of the system of financial policy that has been alike the glory and shame of the dominant party in these Halls—a policy that has made the rich richer and the poor poorer; that has fattened capital and pauperized labor; that has discriminated unjustly and wickedly in favor of sections and special interests, and that has farmed out to the sharks and Shylocks, to the corrupt rings and avaricious money-mongers of the nation, the control of the entire currency of the country. In the class legislation and in the sectional monopolies that have been the disgrace and reproach of American legislation, is to be found one of the chief causes of the "financial difficulty" of 1873, as I shall attempt to show.

Before I proceed to this branch of my subject, I desire to call attention to the assertion I have made, that the representatives on this floor and in the Senate from the sections of the Union favored by congressional legislation, with a few exceptions, have no just conception of the financial condition of the great planting and agricultural interests of the South and West. I think this statement needs no other corroboration than is to be found in the declarations of distinguished gentlemen on this floor, made during the present session of Congress, and by the extracts I have read from a speech lately delivered by the ex-Secretary of the Treasury.

If more proof were needed I would have no hesitation to put on the stand as witnesses, every Representative on this floor, from the great lakes to the gulf and from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, to contradict the ex-Secretary, and to disprove his statement that for the last five years the country has never been more prosperous. His State and his people may be prosperous; but it is the grossest delusion or a most barefaced attempt at deception thus to falsify the condition of the great producing sections of the Union. Instead of there being any truth in the statement, this large section of the Union has never been in a more unprosperous or impecunious condition. I believe I am much nearer the truth when I assert that the so-called Confederate States are to-day poorer than they were the year after Lee's surrender.

As to my own State, I do not hesitate to affirm that the farming interest is more depressed than it has been for thirty years. Improved farms in Missouri, in counties that have been organized and settled for forty years, will not command in greenbacks to-day as much as they would sell for in gold from 1856 to 1860 by from 50 to 100 per cent. Immigrants from the North by the score and by the hundred, in all parts of the State, after making a payment of one-third or one-fourth for a farm, have been compelled to abandon their lands to their vendors. Money has been held at exorbitant rates of interest, and banks and bankers are exacting and obtaining from 1 to 3 per cent. per month. And this state of things is not the result of last fall's panic. In fact the panic has had little or nothing to do with the financial condition of the West. It was about as bad as it could well be before the panic, and I do not know that it has grown any worse, except for a very short time during the stoppage of payment by the banks. Money has been growing scarcer and more stringent; the rates of interest have been increasing, and values have been shrinking, in the face of fair crops and good seasons, for the last five or six years.

Why, Mr. Speaker, how do these gentlemen interpret that mighty organization that has spread like fire on our great prairies, from the sources of the Father of Waters to its mouth, and which began its work long anterior to the late "financial difficulty?" How do they account for the Grangers and the Patrons of Husbandry? When before in the history of this country have they seen the farmers banding together secretly and openly for the protection of their interests? Does not their domestic and isolated life, the very spirit and genius of their calling afford unmistakable evidence that in thus organizing they are controlled by a deep and pervading sense that they are suffering some intolerable grievance? Will gentlemen delude themselves with the idea that this great movement is the work of chronic office-seekers or disappointed politicians? Can they believe that any class of our population, whether agricultural or mechanical, living in country or city, in the East or West, that felt and knew that they were in that prosperous condition represented by the ex-Secretary of the Treasury and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILBER,] could be found spending their time and means in discussing measures of imaginary relief, and combining in town, county, State, and national organizations to redress pretended and unreal wrongs?

No, sir; the very existence of these organizations contradicts the statement that the producer of the West is prospering, or has prospered lately. And the fact that this assumed prosperity of the South and the West only comes from the comparatively small and favored section of the Union, and its existence denied by those having the best means of knowing, affords indubitable evidence that there is "something rotten in Denmark;" and when gentlemen have satisfied themselves that the late panic was caused by "overtrading," by the bursting of Jay Cooke's bubble, or by "local inflation in New York," they are just as far from a true diagnosis of the real disease that is preying upon the vitals of the country's prosperity as they were when they began. They are but the external symptoms of the disease; and the quack called to prescribe for a patient in one of those rich and malarious regions in my State, burning up with fever, and raging with delirium, who told his patient that his fever was caused by the chill that had just racked his frame, and that if he had not had the chill he would have had no fever, was about as wise in his day and generation as those who seek for the cause of the late panic in "overtrading," or in "local inflation," or both.

To what, then, Mr. Speaker, are we to ascribe the general depression of the farming interest of the West, and the producers of the entire country? One of the principal causes of the financial disorder of the country, and notably of the West and South, is beyond question the contracting of the currency, with the view to reach a specie basis and to resume specie payments by the banks and the Government. This has operated with depressing effect upon the labor of the country, and, whether so designed or not, has worked uniformly in the interest of capitalists and money-dealers, brokers, and bankers usurers and extortioners. Every turn of the contracting screw increased the debt of the debtor and the debtor section, and increased relatively the capital of the creditor and of the creditor section. This disastrous policy is founded upon the doubtful idea that our domestic circulation must necessarily conform and assimilate to the international currency of the world, until our circulation has been reduced to greatly less than either of the two great nations of Europe, Great Britain or France.

I think this can be made so clear that there can be no doubt of the correctness of my proposition. Instead of being less, the character of our population—its sparse settlement, and the absence of places of deposit in the South and West—and our great expanse of territory would seem to leave no question as to our currency wants being greater than those of the people of France or Great Britain. In the large cities of this country, as well as in all civilized countries, checks and bank credits supply in a great measure the place of money tokens. By means of these facilities millions of indebtedness are paid and exchanges carried on without the use of a dollar in money, while in the sparse settlements of the West and South payments are only made in money itself. The want of places of deposit convenient and accessible to the farmer makes it a necessity for him to be his own banker, and hence a much larger amount of currency is needed by our western and southern population, relatively, than is required in the older and more densely populated districts.

The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] in his remarks in Committee of the Whole some weeks since, makes our circulation amount to seven hundred and seventy-six millions. He arrives at this conclusion by adding the amount of authorized legal-tenders to the circulation of the national banks, and the amount of fractional currency now appearing from the books of the Treasury to be outstanding. He treats as circulation the entire legal-tender reserve held by the banks, and makes no allowance for the shrinkage of paper circulation, amounting according to the Treasurer's Report (page 12) on the fractional currency to one-fifth in ten years, in round numbers, four out of twenty millions. These deductions being made, and the amount of circulation in this country—exclusive of the gold of the Pacific States—does not exceed five hundred and seventy-five millions; and here are my figures, taken from the last report of the distinguished gentleman of hieroglyphic autograph, the faithful Cerberus of the Treasury:

Outstanding legal-tenders, 1st of November, 1873		$360, 566, 764
Deduct reserves	$102, 074, 104
In Treasury	6, 392, 771
		103, 466, 875
Actual circulation legal-tenders, November 1, 1873		252, 099, 889
National-bank circulation, November 1, 1873		340, 993, 470
Fractional currency, (page 11, Treasurer's Report)		38, 089, 517
Total circulation, without shrinkage		631, 182, 876
Deduct for shrinkage one-half of what the Treasurer states to have been the shrinkage on the first issue of fractional currency (page 12) for ten years, and it amounts to		$52, 500, 000
Which leaves as the circulation on 1st of November, 1873		578, 682, 876

These figures are corroborated by the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency, page 31, of 1873.

The only possible error in these figures is in the estimated shrinkage, by fire and other casualties. I believe that 1 per cent. per annum is the usual estimate for such loss, and has always been regarded as one of the chief profits of banks of issue. My estimate is much less.

The Superintendent of the Bureau of Statistics has kindly furnished me with the amount of the circulating mediums of France and Great Britain and Ireland, and I give his figures and the present estimated population of those countries and of our own, based upon the latest census reports, as well as the area of each.

Countries.	Amount.	Population 1873.	Area, sq. miles.	Per capita.
France	$1,209,000,000	40,000,000	204,000	$30.22
Great Britain and Ireland	686,000,000	30,000,000	121,000	22.86
United States	578,000,000	42,000,000	2,800,000	14.45

It is thus seen that we have $14.45 circulation per head of our population—less by more than one-half than the Superintendent of Statistics estimates for France, and nearly one-third less than that of England and Ireland.

But let me direct the attention of the House to a few more figures, furnished by the Comptroller of the Currency, on page 11 of his report to this Congress. It contains the estimated bank-note circulation of all the States in 1862 and 1873, by States and groups of States. If you estimate the bank-note circulation as being but one-half—it is, in fact, about as 35 national-bank notes are to 29 greenback and fractional currency—these startling results are shown, and they account for the happy, contented, and self-satisfied condition of the representatives of what I have denominated the favored section of the nation. The six New England States have for circulation $33.36 per capita; the five Middle States $25.64; the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States (including Missouri) $5.82, and the nine Northwestern States (including Ohio) $14.18. Estimating that there was in these States as much gold as bank paper in 1862, which is probably far above the truth as to the Southern and Western States, these results are established by the Comptroller's figures:

Six New England States had in 1862	41.80
Five Middle States	19.94
Fourteen Southern and Southwestern States	12.34
Nine Northwestern States	4.98

Mr. Speaker, these figures begin to throw some light upon the question whether the South and West have any reason for clamoring as they do for an increase in the volume of currency. It begins to be manifest also why the gentlemen from the New England and Middle States are so well satisfied to let things move on as they are, while the other sections of the Union demand relief from the wrongs of a contracted currency, exorbitant rates of interest, and universal stagnation of all kinds of business. And in the face of these facts and figures, in the teeth of the universal and unanimous voice of the producing classes of the entire West and South that they are being impoverished and ruined, we are gravely told, by a late head of the financial bureau of the Government, that the country was never more prosperous than it has been for the last five years; and we are to be frightened from our propriety by the bugbear of inflation and a redundant currency.

We demand to be placed on an equality with the Eastern and Middle States, and we are pointed to the continental money of the Revolution, the assignats of France, and the bloated currency of the confederacy. We demand more tools with which to do our exchanges, increase our productions, and build up our waste places, and we are met with the hackneyed cry that we must come to a specie basis. We paid $40,000,000 premium on four hundred millions of indebtedness—four hundred and forty million greenbacks for four hundred million bonds—before it was due, for which the holders paid greenbacks worth fifty cents on the dollar. We have doubled the indebtedness of the taxpayers of the country by agreeing to pay the five-twenty bonds in gold, when they were contracted to be paid in greenbacks, but that does not satisfy the insatiate greed, the voracious appetite of the Shylocks and sharks, the bankers and brokers, the money-mongers and gold-worshipers of the country.

No, sir, these lineal descendants and next of kin to the sordid and mercenary crew whom the Saviour of the world when on earth whipped and scourged from the Temple at Jerusalem, must add to the intolerable burden of debt of the people, by bringing the price of everything down to the standard of gold, and contracting the currency for the purpose of accomplishing that sublimest of all follies in the present condition of the country—resumption of specie payments.

Mr. Speaker, the contracting policy of the Government, inaugurated in the interest of capital and money, by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose groveling instincts I trust now are being fully developed and satisfied amidst the gold and bullion of Threadneedle street, is unparalleled in the history of modern times for its wanton disregard of the rights of the tax-payers of the country, and for its inexcusable contempt for the lessons of experience. If that best of all teachers had failed to shed any light upon our financial path, there might have been some excuse or palliation for the wrongs which have been superinduced by adopting and pursuing it with criminal pertinacity.

Those who have engineered the contraction of the currency for the last seven or eight years, have no such excuse to justify or palliate the foul wrong they have inflicted upon the labor interests of the country. England had traveled the same road, and for twenty-five years her producing classes suffered untold woes because her statesmen listened to the theories of the philosopher in his closet, backed up by the clamor and cupidity of her bankers and brokers, and demanded a return to specie payments from a redundant and expanded paper circulation. The parallel between the condition of the two countries—England from 1797 to 1818 and 1819 and up to 1845, and America from 1861 to 1873—is so complete and perfect throughout, that it is almost impossible to resist the conclusion that the policy of contraction has been inaugurated and carried on for the very object which it has accomplished, the aggrandizement of capital and money at the expense of the labor of the country. Negligence may be so gross as to create the presumption of fraud, and statesmanship may be so blundering as to make it a crime.

England was compelled, in the midst of a life and death struggle with France, to authorize her great financial agent to suspend specie payments. America was under like compulsion, from a like cause. An expanded paper currency, by both governments, was the immediate precursor of a most wonderful increase and activity in all departments of business, notwithstanding each nation was engaged in a most exhausting war—the wars with Napoleon continuing over twenty years, while our civil war lasted less than five years. Each people accumulated an enormous public debt, so that the public debt of Great Britain at the end of over twenty years of armed conflict with Napoleon amounted to more than four billions, an increase of considerably more than three billions. We had, in much less time, run up a debt of about the same sum—three billions. It was an expanded paper currency that enabled both peoples to submit cheerfully to unheard-of taxation, that stimulated agricultural and manufacturing industry, that in England enabled eighteen millions of people to prosper under an annual taxation of $350,000,000 for several years at the close of the war, and up to the time that the policy of a return to specie payments was discussed and ultimately adopted, in 1819 and 1822; the wages of labor were high; the working classes everywhere prosperous; agriculture remunerative; the rates of interest low; and large loans negotiated by the government at but little over 4 per cent. But no sooner was the clamor of the bullionists and gold-worshipers heeded, and the contracting screw put in motion, than a change came over the face of the whole country, notwithstanding a large increase of population, of exports and imports, and in tonnage. There was but one class benefited, and that the capitalists and money-changers; almost every other interest suffered terribly.

I beg to have read from the Clerk's table some extracts from England in 1815 to 1845, by Sir Archibald Alison.

The Clerk read as follows:

Our colonial possessions enriched the earth; the whole West India Islands had fallen into our hands; an empire of sixty millions of men in Hindostan acknowledged our rule; Java was added to our eastern possessions; and the flag of France had disappeared from every station beyond the sea. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures at home had increased in an unparalleled ratio; the landed proprietors were in affluence; wealth to an unheard-of extent had been created among the farmers; the soil, daily increasing in fertility and breadth of cultivated land, had become almost adequate to the maintenance of a rapidly increasing population; our exports, imports, and tonnage had more than doubled since the war began; and though distress, especially during 1810 and 1811, had at times been severely experienced among the manufacturing operatives, yet, upon the whole, and in average years, their condition was one of extraordinary prosperity. The revenue raised by taxation within the year had risen to £72,000,000 in 1815, from £21,000,000 in 1796; the total expenditures, from taxes and loans, had reached in 1814 and 1815, the enormous amount of £117,000,000 each year. In the years 1813 and 1814, being the twentieth and twenty-first of the war, Great Britain had above a million of men in arms in Europe and Asia, and remitted £11,000,000 yearly in subsidies to the continental powers. Yet was this prodigious and unheard-of expenditure so far from exhausting the capital or resources of the country, that the loan in 1814 was obtained at the rate of £4 11*s.* 1*d.* per cent., being a lower rate than that paid at the commencement of the war, although the annual loan at its close was above £35,000,000, and the population of the empire at that period was only eighteen millions, just two-thirds of what it was found to be by the census of 1841. * * * *

Since the year 1819 the empire has exhibited the most extraordinary spectacle that the world has perhaps ever witnessed; and it is to it that we earnestly request the attention of our readers, because then began the series of causes and effects in which we have ever since been, and still are, involved.

Considered in one point of view, there never was a nation which, in an equal space of time, had made so extraordinary a progress. Its population had advanced from 20,600,000 in 1819, to 28,000,000 in 1844; its imports had increased from £30,000,000 in the former period to £70,000,000 in the latter; its exports had advanced, during the same period, from £44,000,000 to £130,000,000; its shipping from 2,350,000 tons to 3,900,000. There never, perhaps, was such a growth in these great limbs of industry in so short a period in any other state. Nor had agriculture been behind the other staple branches of national industry. Its produce had kept pace with the increase, unparalleled in an old state in the population as well as the still more rapid multiplication of cattle and horses for the purposes of use and luxury; and amid this extraordinary growth of consumption the still more extraordinary fact was exhibited of the average importation of grain steadily declining, from the commencement of the century till at length, anterior to the six bad seasons in succession, which commenced in 1836, it had sunk to 400,000 quarters on an average of the five preceding years, being scarce a hundred and twentieth part of the annual consumption of men and animals, which exceeds 60,000,000 quarters. And what is most extraordinary of all, the returns of the income tax when laid on, even in the year 1842, a period of severe and unprecedented commercial depression, proved the existence, in Great Britain alone, of £200,000,000 of annual income of persons enjoying above £150 a year each; of which immense sum, about £150,000,000, was from the fruits of realized capital, either in land or some other durable investment. It is probable that such an accumulation of wealth never existed before in any single state, not even in Rome at the period of its highest splendor.

Considered in another view, there never was a period in which a greater amount of financial embarrassment has been experienced by Government, or more widespread and acute suffering been endured by the people. So far has the exchequer been from sharing in the flood of wealth which has thus been so profusely poured into the empire, that it has, with the exception of two or three years of extraordinary and perilous prosperity, been, during the whole of this period, in a state of difficulty. This steadily increased till it at last brought the nation to such a pass that it was extricated from absolute insolvency only by the reimposition, during the thirtieth year of European peace, of the war income tax. Not only was the provident and far-seeing system of Mr. Pitt for the redemption of the debt practically abandoned, during the necessities of this calamitous period, but the national account was turned the other way and the annual deficiency gradually increased till it had reached the enormous amount of £4,000,000 annually, and added in six years of peace no less than £11,000,000 to the amount of the national debt. The nation, during the latter years of the war, prospered and experienced general well-being under an annual taxation of £72,000,000 drawn from eighteen million souls. In the latter years of the peace it has, with the utmost difficulty, drawn £50,000,000 from a population of twenty-seven millions. Wages in the former period were high, employment abundant, the working classes prosperous, with an export of British and colonial produce of from £45,000,000 to £50,000,000 annually. In the latter, wages were in many trades low, employment difficult, suffering general, with an annual exportation to the amount of £120,000,000 to £130,000,000. * * * * *

Wages sank during these disastrous periods in the manufacturing districts so low that they barely sufficed with the great bulk of workers, especially females, for the support of existence. Serious insurrections broke out in 1820 and 1842, both in England and Scotland, ostensibly for political purposes, but mainly occasioned by the general distress among the manufacturing operatives, as was decisively proved by their entire extinction when labor again received a remunerating return.

Farming capital in the agricultural districts was, during their distress, everywhere grievously abridged—in many places totally annihilated.

Mr. BUCKNER. From these statistics and figures it appears that from 1792 to 1797, when bank paper was exchangeable for coin, the paper currency was $80,000,000 and the exports $50,000,000. From 1797 to 1818, the paper currency had risen to $240,000,000 and the exports to $250,000,000. From the time the bill of 1819, compelling specie payment, went into operation the currency was so contracted that the entire paper and gold circulation in 1845 of England was only $280,000,000, notwithstanding the fact that the exports had run up to nearly $600,000,000, the imports to $330,000,000, and the shipping had grown from two and one-half to four and one-half million tons, and the population had advanced from fourteen to nineteen millions in 1845. Instead of the circulation being $280,000,000, it would have been $600,000,000 if it had kept pace with her exports; compared with her imports, it should have been $480,000,000; with her tonnage, it should have been $470,000,000; and if with population, it should have been $360,000,000. The author says that—

So prodigious a contraction, at a time when the national transactions and wants, as measured by the exports, imports, shipping, and population, were so rapidly increasing, necessarily produced incalculable suffering, an enormous augmentation of debts, and diminution of the price of all sorts of produce, and the most ruinous financial embarrassments.

And to what cause does the distinguished writer of these extracts attribute the misery of the laboring classes of England from 1819 to 1845, and the universal depression of the agricultural interests of the kingdom? He says that the chief cause of all the evils under which England labored and suffered for twenty-five years was the contraction of the currency, unnecessarily made to bring about the resumption of specie payments in 1819; and if facts, figures, and statistics can prove a proposition it is demonstrated beyond cavil or any lingering of doubt.

By the report of the United States Treasurer for 1872, page 291, I find that on June 38, 1865, there was—

United States outstanding (Treasury) currency	$698, 918, 800
Seven-thirty notes	830, 000, 000
National-bank notes	131, 452, 000
State-bank notes, estimated	40, 000, 000
Total	1, 700, 370, 800

By Treasurer Spinner's report of 1868, there was—

Treasury currency, July, 1868	$444, 196, 262
Seven-thirty notes, January 1, 1868	240, 591, 300
Three per cent. certificates	50, 000, 000
National-bank notes, July, 1868	294, 908, 264
State-bank notes, (estimated)	4, 000, 000
Total	1, 033, 695, 826

Amount, as heretofore stated, as circulation, without shrinkage, November, 1873, $631,020,000; showing a contraction between 1865 and 1868, of $666,000,000; and between 1868 and 1873, of $402,000,000; while our increase in imports, exports, weath and population, has been as follows:

Years.	Imports.	Exports.	Population.	Wealth.
1868 to 1873	271, 000, 000	259, 000, 000	4, 000, 000	$11, 000, 000, 000

And if eight hundred millions of circulation was sufficient for the country in 1868, our increase in population in 1873 entitles us to over nine hundred millions now, our increase in wealth to eleven hundred and forty millions, our increase in imports to twelve hundred millions, and our increase on exports to twelve hundred and eighty millions, instead of which we have been cut down to an actual circulation of less than six hundred millions, and of that two-thirds has belonged to one section of the Union.

But this contraction has been surpassed by ours, and has produced like disastrous results.

I regret that I have not time to make further extracts from the figures and statistics contained in this little work. I must pass from this branch of my subject with the single observation that the error of British statesmen, with the light before them in 1819, may be excused; but with the experience derived from English history on this vital and important question, the blunder of our financiers is without excuse, justification, or palliation. As in England, so in the United States, the effect of a return to specie payments, as it was done there, and is attempted here, has to all intents and purposes nearly doubled all debts incurred under the expanded currency of the war. So that, on the supposition that our national debt of $2,200,000,000 was contracted in a redundant currency, we are practically owing in our contracted and contracting currency, $4,000,000,000, with this aggravation in our case, that a large part of this debt is due from the less to the more favored section of the country; from the producing to the moneyed section of the Union; from the poverty to the wealth of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown that the "local inflation" at New York from April "to December" of last year, as well as the overtrading and speculation among bankers and brokers and stock-gamblers preceding the late panic, was an effect and not the cause of this "financial" difficulty; and that the cause is to be found, in part at least, in the unequal distribution of the circulation, and to its unwise and ruinous contraction.

As I have before stated, the effect of this contraction has been as detrimental to the West and South as it has been beneficial to the North and East. What it took from the former it has bestowed upon the latter in the shape of gold interest upon untaxed bonds and dividends upon bank capital. Both interest and dividends must be produced from the labor and industry of the whole country, and combined with the unequal distribution of the circulation has had the effect to drive all the blood from the extremities to the seat of life; and as in the human system, congestion and disease result from an excess of circulation at the heart, so our financial policy produced a similar result last fall at New York, the financial heart of the nation. The same causes must produce like results in the future, and unless Congress shall retrace its steps and repair the wrongs of its unjust, sectional, and monopolizing legislation, a speedy recurrence of such financial difficulties may be predicted with as much certainty as the astronomer calculates an eclipse of the sun. Can any of these wrongs be rectified by an extension of the national banking system? Will the distribution of twenty-five or fifty millions of national banking doled out by the Comptroller to the South and West from the enormous excess now held by the New England States tend to relieve these impoverished sections? I answer most emphatically, no. On the contrary, they will but aggravate the maladies under which we are suffering, and render another "financial difficulty" more certain and its return more speedy.

The following shows the present outstanding and authorized circulation by groups of States, taken from page 7 of the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873:

States and Territories.	Circulation.	Excess.	Deficiency.
Six New England States	$110, 489, 996	$70, 690, 046	.....
Five Middle States	124, 608, 139	9, 416, 503	.....
Fourteen Southern and Southwestern States, including District of Columbia and Missouri	38, 160, 308	.....	$51, 271, 034
Nine Western States	78, 785, 148	.....	21, 423, 811
California, Oregon, Nevada, and Western Territories	1, 924, 688	.....	7, 625, 000
Total circulation	354, 000, 000	.....	.....

It was the great expounder of the Constitution who is reported as having said of the old banks of issue and deposit, that "human ingenuity never devised a scheme so well adapted to fertilize the rich man's field with the sweat of the poor man's brow;" and if there was any truth in this strong and forcible language when applied to the State banks or the old national banks, what vocabulary shall furnish language to characterize the hydra-headed monster fastened upon the country by the cunning financial trickery of the money-changers and monopolists of the East? I will enumerate very briefly some of the objections to this fiscal contrivance.

1. It assumes and presupposes the permanent existence of a national debt. Its chief corner-stone and foundation is national indebtedness, and its friends seek thus to make "a national debt a national blessing." If the nation could pay off its debt, there could be no such thing as a national bank, such as now curses the industry of the country. Why shall we foster an institution with two thousand heads, and destined to be indefinitely multiplied, whose primary interest will be in the direction of lavish expenditure and high taxation, so as, if possible, to hinder and prevent forever the payment of the public debt?

2. These institutions, and all such monopolies, whether organized under State or Federal laws, are perpetual antagonists to the exercise of the powers conferred on the national Government by the Constitution, and the aiders and abettors in its failure of duty to supply a circulating medium for the people. There necessarily exists an irrepressible conflict between the circulation of these banks and the direct obligations of the Government. We cannot serve God and mammon. The field of circulation cannot be jointly occupied by these antagonizing and hostile forces. One or the other must and will reign supreme and paramount sooner or later. We have no right to farm out at any price, much less for the miserable pittance of 1 per cent. rent on the circulation of these banks, the right to supply the circulation for forty million people.

What would be thought of a proposition to farm out the power to declare war, or to provide and maintain a navy, or to establish post-offices and post-roads? What right has the Congress to give a monopoly for twenty years to a combination of individuals to supply the nation with the means necessary to do the exchanges and transact the business of the country more than it has to farm out the business of the Post-Office Department, or of the Navy or War Department? The duty, I hold, is equally imperative in one case as the other.

Such was the opinion of that great apostle of State rights and strict construction, Thomas Jefferson. And if it should not be deemed irreverent and disrespectful in a body so eminently loyal as this to name the name of John C. Calhoun, the master-intellect of his day, the sworn foe of centralization and the unswerving friend of constitutional union and the liberties of the people, I would cite him as authority for the position I have taken.

Mr. Calhoun, in his speech on the bill authorizing an issue of Treasury notes, September 19, 1839, said:

It is, then, my impression that, in the present condition of the world, a paper currency in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its greater cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount. * * * * * * *

It may throw some light on this subject to state that North Carolina, just after the Revolution, issued a large amount of paper, which was made receivable in dues to her. It was also made a legal tender, but which of course was not obligatory after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A large amount, say between four and five hundred thousand dollars, remained in circulation after that period, and continued to circulate for more than twenty years at par with gold and silver during the whole time, with no other advantage than being received in the revenue of the State, which was much less than $100,000 per annum. * * * *

No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank—more stable, more safe. Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions? Why should it not be safe in its own hands, while it shall be considered safe in the hands of eight hundred private institutions, scattered all over the country, and which have no other object but their own private profit, to increase which they almost constantly extend their business to the most dangerous extremes? And why should the community be compelled to give 6 per cent. discount for the Government credit blended with that of the banks, when the superior credit of the Government could be furnished separately, without discount, to the mutual advantage of the Government and the community? Why, let me ask, should the Government be exposed to such difficulties as the present, by mingling its credit with the banks, when it could be exempt from all such by using, by itself, its own safer credit? It is time the community, which has so deep an interest in a sound and cheap currency, and the equality of the laws between one portion of the country and another, should reflect seriously on these things, not for the purpose of oppressing any interest, but to correct gradually disorders of a dangerous character, which have insensibly, in the long course of years, without being perceived by any one, crept into the state. The question is not between credit and no credit, as some would have us believe, but in what form credit can best perform the functions of a sound and safe currency.

Believing that there might be a sound and safe paper currency founded on the credit of the Government exclusively, I was desirous that those who are responsible and have the power should have availed themselves of the opportunity, &c. * *

We are told the form I suggested is but a repetition of old continental money—a ghost that is ever conjured up by all who wish to give the banks an exclusive monopoly of Government credit. The assertion is not true; there is not the least analogy between them. The one was a promise to pay when there was no revenue, and the other a promise to receive in the dues of Government when there is abundant revenue.

We are also told that there is no instance of a Government paper that did not depreciate. In reply, I affirm that there is none, assuming the form I propose, that ever did depreciate. Whenever a paper receivable in the dues of Government had anything like a fair trial, it has succeeded. Instance the case of North Carolina, referred to in my opening remarks. The drafts of the Treasury at this moment, with all their incumbrance, are nearly at par with gold and silver; and I might add the instance alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in which he admits that as soon as the excess of the issues of the Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky were reduced to the proper point its notes rose to par. The case of Russia might also be mentioned. In 1827 she had a fixed paper circulation, in the form of bank-notes, but which were inconvertible, of upward of $120,000,000, estimated in the metallic ruble, and which had for years remained without fluctuation, having nothing to sustain it but that it was received in the dues of the Government, and that, too, with a revenue of only about $90,000,000 annually. I speak on the authority of a respectable traveler. Other instances, no doubt, might be added, but it needs no such support.

It has another and striking advantage over bank circulation, in its superior cheapness, as well as greater stability and safety. Bank paper is cheap to those who make it; but dear, very dear to those who use it, fully as much so as gold and silver. It is the little cost of its manufacture, and the dear rates at which it is furnished to the community, which give the great profit to those who have a monopoly of the article. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the profit by the splendid palaces which we see under the name of banking-houses, and the vast fortunes which have been accumulated in this branch of business; all of which must ultimately be derived from the productive powers of the community, and of course adds so much to the cost of production. On the other hand, the credit of Government, while it would greatly facilitate its financial operations, would cost nothing, or next to nothing, both to it and the people, and of course would add nothing to the cost of production, which would give every branch of our industry, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, as far as its circulation might extend, great advantages, both at home and abroad.

Later still, March 22, 1838, in his speech on the sub-treasury bill, Mr. Calhoun said:

I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered—what heretofore I have but suggested—that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive it in all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold and silver at their option, would, to the extent that it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government; that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves; and that if, by possibility, it should depreciate, the loss would fall not on the people but on the Government itself; for the only effect of depreciation would be virtually to reduce the taxes, to prevent which the interest of the Government would be a sufficient guarantee. I shall not go into the discussion now, but on a suitable occasion I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I would be able to do more—to prove that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances, according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution; and that those at least who think that Congress can authorize the notes of private State corporations to be received in the public dues are estopped from denying its right to receive its own paper.

In the letter of Mr. Jefferson to his son-in-law, Eppes, dated June 24, 1813, he recommended the issue of Government notes and foreshadowed the proper monetary system for the country. I will ask the Clerk to read from volume 4 of his published Correspondence.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the war of 1755, our State availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper money, bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and, to insure its credit, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. Within a very short time, not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. We then issued bills, bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest. These were readily received and never depreciated a single farthing. In the revolutionary war, the old Congress and the States issued bills without interest and without tax. They occupied the channels of circulation very freely, till those channels were overflowed by an excess beyond all the calls of circulation. But although we have so improvidently suffered the field of circulating medium to be filched from us by private individuals, yet, I think, we may recover it in part, and even in the whole if the States will co-operate with us. If Treasury bills are emitted on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to insure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of 6 per cent., there is no one who would not take them in preference to the bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest; and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hoards to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be emitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest; and if ever their credit faltered, open public loans, on which these bills alone should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation, so as to maintain that in an equilibrium with specie. It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which, in the beginning, we should encounter in ousting the banks from their possession of the circulation; but a steady and judicious alternation of emissions and loans would reduce them in time.

But it will be asked, are we to have no banks? Are merchants and others to be deprived of the resource of short accommodations found so convenient? I answer, let us have banks, but let them be such as are alone to be found in any country on earth except Great Britain. There is not a bank of discount on the continent of Europe (at least there was not one when I was there) which offers anything but cash in exchange for discounted bills. No one has a natural right to the trade of a money-lender but he who has the money to lend. Let those, then, among us, who have a moneyed capital, and who prefer employing it in loans rather than otherwise, set up banks and give cash or national bills for the notes they discount. Perhaps, to encourage them, a larger interest than is legal in the other cases might be allowed them, on the condition of their lending for short periods only. It is from Great Britain we copy the idea of giving paper in exchange for discounted bills; and while we have derived from that country some good principles of government and legislation, we unfortunately run into the most servile imitation of all her practices ruinous as they prove to her, and with the gulf yawning before us into which those practices are precipitating her.

Mr. BUCKNER. 3. It is a most costly and expensive medium of circulation, and in this respect excels in enormity of wrong all other cunningly devised schemes of legalized robbery of the many for the benefit of the few that the wit of man has ever devised. Resolved into its simple elements, the operation is this: The people, through their governmental agency, loan their own notes to a combination of individuals (the shareholders of these banks) at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum, interest or tax, for which in return these shareholders loan as currency to the people their notes indorsed by the people, by and through their Government, at from 8 per cent. per annum to 3 per cent. per month, the people paying all the expenses of issuing and printing the notes, amounting since the organization of these banks to about two and a half million dollars.

These bank monopolists first receive 6 per cent., in gold, semi-annually on their bonds, deposited for the security of their circulation, and they also lend out from 75 to 90 per cent. of the face value of the bonds, at any rate of discount they can obtain, their net earnings, varying as the report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows, from 4 to 18 per cent. semi-annually. If the gold interest received by these monopolists semi-annually, amounting in the aggregate to $24,000,000, less the tax of 1 per cent. on circulation, and the average rate of discount exacted on loans from these banks to the people (not less than 8 per cent. average) be considered, the cost to the people of this national-bank luxury cannot be less than fifty or sixty million dollars per annum for the use of three hundred and fifty-four millions of circulation. And if to this be added the salaries of bank officers, State and municipal taxes, and other needful expenses attendant upon their business, the tax upon the productive industries and resources of the country becomes most frightful and alarming.

By reference to page 57 of the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, it will be found that the net earnings of the national banks on capital and surplus in the following States for the years 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, were as follows:

States.	1870.	1871.	1872.	1873.
North Carolina	14.39	12.08	11.99	13.27
Georgia	16.11	12.33	12.65	14.52
Texas	23.36	13.23	21.22	21.91
Kentucky	13.79	11.52	10.47	11.56
Tennessee	16.65	15.48	13.58	12.94
Ohio	11.89	11.90	12.12	11.62
Indiana	12.32	11.73	10.65	10.55
Illinois	14.60	13.32	12.57	13.40
Chicago				16.31
Michigan	14.77	13.32	13.72	13.48
Detroit	15.04	15.48	12.16	13.59
Wisconsin	13.77	14.32	13.62	13.38
Milwaukee			17.93	13.75
Iowa	13.46	11.84	17.70	12.62
Minnesota	16.15	15.68	14.32	17.83
Missouri	19.12	15.58	18.14	17.16
Kansas	17.16	21.73	15.89	16.50

When before did banks in this country make 10 to 23 per cent. per annum, after all expenses are paid?

And what good end do they serve? Why should the people be taxed even to the amount of the 6 per cent. gold interest on the bonds, which give the notes of national banks their credit, when by the substitution of the legal-tender currency, or Government obligations in some form, the same amount of circulation would cost the people comparatively nothing? It is the credit, the resources, and the faith of the Government that alone give both, currency and circulation, and the national banks are worse than a useless drain upon the resources of the country, benefiting no one but the favored shareholders who own and control them. And when it is recollected that the profits derived from the business carried on by these banks, as well as the interest on the bonds held as security for their circulation, belongs, in large proportion, to the favored section of the Union, we have another imposing item to add to the causes of the "local inflation" in New York.

4. The national banks have been, and must continue, under the policy that is destroying all the great labor interests of the Union, one of the principal levers by which the contracting screw is moved. One of its chief features is contraction. Every national bank organized under existing laws necessarily creates a local contraction of from 30 to 40 per cent. Let me illustrate this proposition.

A bank is desired by some of the capitalists of my district, with a capital of $100,000. We have no five-twenties or 5 per cents.; they are held and owned in the East or in Europe. The first step is to buy United States bonds, now worth 118; and $118,000 must be taken out of circulation and sent East to purchase the bonds, to be deposited as security for $90,000 issued to the bank as its circulation. In addition to this, there is required a reserve of 15 per cent. in legal-tenders, to be kept by country banks, which amounts to $13,500, thus reducing the amount of the local circulation from $118,000 to $76,500.

Of the sum of $356,000,000 of legal-tenders outstanding before the late financial difficulty, $102,000,000 were held by the banks as a reserve which could not be used except in violation of law; and if this banking system is to be increased by the $44,000,000 of reserves legalized by the bill which passed this House a few days since, over one-fifth, or $8,800,000, cannot go into circulation, but must form a reserve for the new banks that will be established to rob and plunder the people by the exaction of usurious interest. But contraction of the currency is the meat and drink of the money-sharks the world over; and no fiscal device was ever more satisfactory to this class of population than the national banks. The Comptroller of the Currency is much enamored of these national shaving-shops. But I should doubt whether the business men of Missouri who contributed to swell the dividends of these banks to 17½ per cent. for six months in 1871; or of Milwaukee, which shows 19 per cent. dividends for six months in 1872; or of Iowa, which shows 14 per cent. for the same time; or of Louisville, dividing 11 per cent. for six months, for same time in same year; or Leavenworth, which reports 22.4 per cent. in 1870, regard these financial machines with like admiration.

If the false and fallacious theory obtains that the market value of gold is dependent upon the volume of paper currency, and that the best means to reach a specie basis is to contract the circulation, I do not know that the theorizers could have hit upon a device better adapted to their purpose than the national banks. But let them understand, once for all, that success must be accomplished by the destruction and ruin of every other interest than that of capital, and of every other section but that one specially favored by congressional legislation.

5. The national banking associations are not only a monopoly by which, for a nominal and paltry consideration, the Government has turned over to a comparatively few individuals the issue and control of nearly two-thirds of the monetary circulation of the Union, and to that extent vesting these institutions with sovereign power over the business, trade, and commerce of the nation, and over the fortunes of individuals, but it has the additional demerit of being an almost exclusively sectional monopoly. It is a double-headed monopoly; sectional as well as individual. It not only gives exclusive privileges to a few, but the few are also confined in a great measure to a section.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that the six New England States, with a population of 3,458,000, have a bank circulation of $110,489,000, an excess of $70,000,000 beyond their due share, while Illinois and Missouri, with a population of 4,260,000, has $22,543,000, and a deficiency of $15,314,000. This sectional monopoly is the more startling and unjust when contributions to the support of the Government by sections are contrasted—the six New England States having paid in 1873 internal-revenue duties amounting to $5,573,000, while my State and its neighbor on this side of the Mississippi River paid internal taxes amounting to $20,752,000.

Why, sir, even poor old Virginia, curtailed of her once fair proportions, with a banking circulation of three and a half millions, pays more revenue to the General Government by $2,000,000 than all New England, with a less bank circulation than little Rhode Island and Providence Plantations by near $10,000,000.

Verily, this great Government is administered upon the principle that "whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath."

And does any one harbor the thought that the New England States will surrender any of the excess of circulation they have, or consent that there shall be any real increase of the circulation of these banks in the Southern and Western States? I venture the opinion that even Rhode Island, with her sixty-three dollars circulation to every man, woman, and child within her territory, will not admit that she has more circulation than she needs, while she cannot consent to increase the national-bank circulation because of her ardent and unselfish devotion to the golden calf. Specie resumption is, next to a plenty of irredeemable paper, the one thing needful for New England. So that as long as we continue this infamous system of individual and sectional plunder the South and West must be ground to powder beneath the upper and the nether millstone. We cannot have a redistribution, because New England has none to spare. We cannot have any increase, because that would drive us, according to the theories of her political economists, that far from the consummation of all material and financial good—specie payments.

But, Mr. Speaker, the most potent objection to the national banks and to all that brood of financial measures to which I have adverted, and of which it has been the ready auxiliary, is the increased rate of interest which, either singly or in combination with these measures, it has brought about. Secretary Chase, in 1862, complained of 6½ per cent. as being excessive and beyond the ability of the Government to pay. This was at the beginning of the war, when the future of the country was clouded in doubt and darkness. It would certainly have been wise statesmanship to have borrowed money at a lower rate of interest after the war closed and peace reigned over a united country. But not only was the debt largely increased, probably duplicated, by what the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] characterizes as the humbugging act of March 18, 1868, by which it is said the Government pledged its faith to pay the five-twenties in gold, principal and interest, when, by the terms of the act of February, 1862, and according to the highest republican authority, the late Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, these bonds were payable in greenbacks, but the rent or interest was fixed at a rate that has affected the price of money throughout the country.

The following remarks by Mr. Stevens are taken from the Congressional Globe, and were made in 1868, when the bill making five-twenties payable in gold was under discussion in the House:

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What was that law? That bonds of a certain amount should bear 5 per cent. interest in gold. Now, up to the time they fall due we must pay them faithfully. After they fall due they are payable in money, just as the gentleman understands "money;" just as I understand it; just as we all understood it when we passed the law authorizing that loan; just as it was a dozen times explained upon the floor by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when called upon by gentlemen to explain what it meant, and just as the whole House agreed that it meant.

Mr. O'NEILL obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to have one or two minutes more.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will yield to my colleague one or two minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I want to say that if this loan was to be paid according to the intimation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS;] if I knew that any party in this country would go for paying in coin that which is payable in money, thus enhancing it one-half; if I knew there was such a platform and such a determination this day on the part of any party, I would vote for the other side—Frank Blair and all. I would vote for no such swindle upon the tax-payers of the country; I should vote for no such speculation in favor of the large bondholders, the millionaires, who took advantage of our folly in granting them coin payment of interest. And I declare—well, it is hard to say it—but if even Frank Blair stood upon the platform of paying the bonds according to the contract, and the republican candidates stood upon the platform of paying bloated speculators twice the amount we agreed to pay them, then I would vote for Frank Blair—even if a worse man than Seymour headed the ticket. That is all I want to say.

Six per cent. gold interest payable semi-annually, with exemption from municipal, State, and Federal taxation, has been equal to not less than an average of 9 per cent. per annum in lawful money, while the cost to the people in the interest paid to the national banks has been considerably in excess of 9 per cent. At this last rate, $300,000,000 of bank currency, compounded annually for nine years, amounts to over $251,000,000. The Government has been the great money-borrower of the country, and with resources, present as well as prospective, greater and more diversified than those of any other nation on the globe, and with a credit untarnished by the slightest taint of repudiation or want of faith to its engagements, it has erected a standard and fixed a rate of interest on its obligations, and authorized its fiscal agency to demand rates for the use of the credit of the nation that has necessarily advanced the price of money to all private borrowers having less credit and more limited resources to a point utterly unbearable, and specially ruinous to the great labor interests of this country.

No legitimate industry in this country can thrive and prosper under the oppressive burden of interest the productive industries have been forced to pay for the last seven or eight years. I believe it is susceptible of demonstration, that the average annual increase in the productive wealth of the country does not run above 4 per cent., and I think has been less than 3 per cent. per annum, since the war. The painstaking and well-informed statistician at the head of the Bureau of Statistics, estimates this annual accumulation at about 2½ per cent. per annum, and if either of these estimates approximates the truth, how glaring becomes the wrong and injustice to the producing interests of the nation, by which the capitalist, the speculator, and the money-dealer has been able to realize from 9 to 30 per cent. per annum upon his non-producing capital.

Need we wonder at the alarming spectacle exhibited in this land of boasted equality of civil rights, at the wonderful growth and power of the moneyed aristocracy of the country, and of the increasing destitution of the laboring classes; of so much suffering by one portion of the people, with so much splendid prosperity in another; of unbounded private wealth alongside of squalid poverty; great increase in national resources with constant decrease in the comforts of a large portion of the people?

Mr. Speaker, let me say to the dominant party of the country, whose pride and boast is that they have liberated four million slaves, and have crowded the statute-books of Congress with enactments intended to protect them in the exercise of the rights of freemen, that you have by your financial policy nullified and neutralized all the benefits of your waste of treasure and blood, and of your well-meant legislation in behalf of the negro, and unless you retrace your steps and cease your discriminating legislation in favor of capital, sections, and interests, you will have consigned the African to a bondage more galling and to a task-master more pitiless and unrelenting than those delineated on the imaginary pages of Uncle Tom's Cabin.

It is no just reply to these views to be told that the average profit of the two thousand national banks on capital and surplus, as reported by Comptroller Knox, is but little over 8 per cent. The point is not what the banks make as clear profit, but what these luxuries cost the people. To estimate this, we must know the gross earnings of these broker-shops, and this information is not given to us. We can only conjecture what have been the expenses of conducting these institutions—the princely salaries paid to presidents, cashiers, tellers, clerks, and attorneys, and how much has been contributed "where it will do the most good." All these charges are borne by the producing and laboring classes, and must be calculated to ascertain the extent to which they are robbed and plundered by these cunningly devised contrivances.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other points of objection to these institutions. If my time permitted, I should like to say something on their centralizing influence, their political power, and the peril of intrusting to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Comptroller of the Currency, or any other officer, such absolute power over the business interests of the country as the national banking law gives. I should like to discuss the question of divorce of the Government from banking in all its forms, whether State or national, free banking or monopoly banking, and to present more in detail the views I hold as to the duty of the Government to furnish to the people a paper medium of exchange based upon its credit and the resources of the country, that will circulate with gold and at par with it, when the proper time shall have arrived, and that will exclude all aid or assistance from paper issued either by State banks or national banks.

I hope never to see another bank organized in this country, whether State or national, with power to issue its lying promises of payment in specie. And I have no doubt that Treasury notes, even without being made legal tender for debts between individuals, and good for all dues of the Government of every kind except the interest on the public debt, and convertible into United States bonds at a low rate of interest, would answer all the demands of our internal commerce; relieve the industry of the country of its oppressive burdens and place all sections of the Union upon an equality as to the favors of the Government; prepare the way for an influx of gold and silver, and gradually liquidate and discharge the public debt. If I could have any doubt of the value of such a circulating medium and its capacity to rescue us from the clutches of avaricious Shylocks, selfish bankers, and the sordid mercenaries of capital and money, I would confidently trust to the opinions of the two wisest statesmen and most sagacious politicians whose names adorn the history of America. I allude to Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Calhoun. Besides the authority of their opinions, we know that Virginia in 1755 issued such a paper medium that was equal to gold. North Carolina did the same thing during the war of the Revolution, and Kentucky accomplished the same result by means of the Commonwealth Bank, alluded to in debate some time since by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

In addition to this, Mr. Calhoun states that Russia kept in circulation at one time $120,000,000 at par with gold, when her yearly payments were less than $90,000,000. And it is a historical fact that during the last years of the Napoleonic wars, (as stated by Alison, pages 76, 77,) the—

> Allied sovereigns issued paper notes, guaranteed by Russia, Prussia, and England, which passed as cash from Kamtschatka to the Rhine, and produced the currency which brought the wars of Napoleon to a close.

But in my judgment any effort to relieve the distress of the laboring interests of the country either by an increase of circulation or by an issue of bonds bearing a low rate of interest, or by any other scheme, will be worse than useless until the voice of the producer is heeded by Congress and the national-bank villainy is obliterated.

I can see no hope of any permanent reform in the monetary condition of the country until this double-headed monstrosity is put into a course of liquidation. It stands as the great barrier to the permanent prosperity of the country. It is the lion in our path of departure from the financial policy adopted in an hour of national necessity and sectional passion, mingled with selfish cupidity, and fastened upon the country when war was flagrant or when the negro and his rights was the idol to whom the dominant party offered up incense and adoration. We have reason to congratulate ourselves that the deeds and acts of those unfortunate days have passed into history, and that we have no such excuse to maintain and reinvigorate this gross wrong to the labor of the country as those who participated in its conception, or in enlarging the sphere of its mischief.

Mr. Speaker, it has been about a twelvemonth since the country was astounded and the public conscience shocked by the revelations of the mismanagement, fraud, and corruption of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the financial manipulations of the inner ring known as the Credit Mobilier. If my memory serves me aright the report of the committee so ably and faithfully presided over by my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] showed that Ames, Durant, and McComb, and their fellow-conspirators, had robbed the Government of about $40,000,000 in building this great highway to the Pacific. But, sir, that sum is a mere bagatelle to the millions that the national banking system has extorted from the hard earnings of the producers of the country's wealth in the nine years of its existence. The difference between the cost to the people of the national-bank circulation, and of legal-tender security at an average interest of 8 per cent. currency on the bonds held as security for these national-bank notes compounded annually for nine years is more than six times the robbery of the Credit Mobilier ring, to say nothing of the untold millions that have been filched in the shape of usurious interest and exorbitant rates of exchange.

This national banking syndicate is the veritable Credit Mobilier of the United States of America. That investigated last winter and so ingloriously brought to grief is but a pigmy by the side of this giant of legalized robbery and sectional monopoly. The Pacific Railroad ring was small in numbers, limited in its sphere of operations, greedy of appetite and voracious of everything within its reach. The national-bank mobilier has far more stomachs to fill, and exercises its jurisdiction over the area of a continent, but its greed is no less insatiate and remorseless. As the one was exposed and throttled in the last Congress, I trust that this Congress will put a quietus upon this most dangerous and most gigantic form of legalized plunder.

Am I asked if we are never to return to specie payments? Never, I answer, if by specie payments is meant a return to the issue of bank-notes, promising to pay specie that we know they never did pay or could pay. But if by a return to specie payments it is to be understood that the Government shall give to its creditors the option to take the obligations or notes of the Government, or gold, as the creditor may desire, I am so far inclined to the specie-basis theory as to see no objection to looking forward to this result as a desirable consummation in the future; that is, that our circulation, when the condition of the country is prepared for it, shall consist of Treasury notes, with or without being a legal tender, but receivable for all public dues, and gold and silver coin.

But of all the vagaries that ever were conceived in the brain of a visionary, or enunciated by the speculative dreamer, that which seeks to bring us from an expanded currency to a specie basis by contracting the volume of currency and crushing out the productive industries of the country to bring about that result is the wildest and the most unpractical. The whole basis of this theory is false and fallacious. It is that the difference between the market value of gold coin and our paper money is measured by the volume of the latter, and that gold has a fixed and unvariable value.

Neither proposition has any foundation to rest upon, as can be demonstrated by an array of numberless facts if my time permitted. These have been the errors from which has sprung the general distress in the South and West, growing out of the attempt to contract the currency to a point where resumption could begin. With the immense debt, county and State, national and corporate, now burdening the people, a great proportion of which is held abroad, and an annual interest thereon estimated from $150,000,000 to $225,000,000, resumption, or an attempt at resumption now or in the near future, would be a calamity more disastrous and far-reaching in its effects than can be conceived.

No permanent resumption, it seems to me, can take place until the industries of the country are in a more prosperous condition. A short cotton crop in the South, a poor harvest of cereals in the Northwest, a heavy demand for gold coin by any of the great powers of Europe, would inevitably create a drain of the precious metals from this country, suspension by the banks, and a return to an irredeemable currency, with bankruptcy, exorbitant rates of interest, paralysis of business, starvation among the laboring classes, and a long train of attendant evils. To attempt resumption in the present monetary condition of the country is the supremest folly that can be conceived. We must practice economy as a nation and as individuals, develop the dormant wealth of the country by wise legislation, state and national, reduce our gold interest, and offer inducements to our own capital to take our bonds at a low rate of interest, increase our exportable productions, and take off all the shackles of trade, internal and external, that can be done with safety.

And here let me give a passing remark to a strange and singular paradox which the advocates for resumption offer to our consideration. According to their theory, irredeemable paper is the great curse of the country, and resumption of specie payments is the sovereign remedy for all our financial ills. It is the chorus of every board of exchange, or chamber of commerce, and of nine-tenths of the bankers, brokers, merchants, and money-dealers in the East, and yet it is an indisputable fact that, within the last thirty years, the banks of the United States have suspended specie payments three times, and that under the influence and by the use of an irredeemable currency the country was brought up to the point of resumption twice, and is being tried a third time.

When money has heretofore become stringent, as in 1837, 1857, and 1861; when hard times and commercial failures presaged pecuniary disaster; when the laboring classes were thrown out of employment, and distress pervaded all departments of business, then suspension of specie payments was the remedy and the sole remedy, and the business of the whole country was conducted in great measure by irredeemable paper money.

Now, when we have had a severe panic—a suspension of greenback payments and universal embarrassment among the laboring classes of the country--the remedy of our financialtphysicians is resumption of specie payments, and that, too, by contraction. If this be financial wisdom, then I confess to my incapacity to comprehend or appreciate it.

From the views I have thus imperfectly presented to the House, the remedies for the present financial ills of the country may be readily inferred.

First. The entire grain-growing and cotton-planting regions of the Union demand an increase of the volume of currency, as well to place them on an equality with the more favored sections, as to enable them to develop their natural resources, and to aid in paying off their share of the national debt. The history of the last few years of this country, and the history of England since the resumption of specie payments there in 1819, prove the difficulty if not the impossibility of paying off a heavy debt incurred in a time of expanded circulation with a contracted currency.

The debt of Great Britain was not reduced exceeding $100,000,000 from 1819 to 1843. During that time the population had increased from twenty millions to twenty-eight millions; the imports had increased from one hundred and fifty millions to three hundred and fifty millions; exports had advanced during the same period from two hundred and twenty millions to six hundred and fifty millions; and the shipping from two and one-third million tons to four and one-half million tons. In 1819 eighty-two millions of her debt was paid off, while twenty-four years afterward, under the operation of the specie-basis theory, the revenues of the kingdom had not increased, but there was a deficiency of several millions to pay ordinary expenses. Her public debt of four billions stands to-day a monument of the folly we are now imitating.

If we do not retrace our steps, and approximate our volume of currency somewhat to its standard in 1865 and 1867, I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction that the child is yet unborn who will see the present debt paid or greatly reduced below its present sum.

Secondly. For the purpose of getting rid of an odious, oppressive, expensive, and sectional monopoly, the notes of the national banks should be gradually withdrawn, and their places substituted with legal-tenders or notes issued by the Government, good for all dues to the Government (customs duties included) except the interest on the public debt, and convertible into Government bonds bearing a low rate of interest. The difference in the market value of greenbacks and gold would thus disappear, our annual interest would be reduced, and we should reach resumption quicker by this road than by the process of contraction, and without sacrifice of the industrial interests of the nation. If banks are wanted by the States, they will be established wherever they are needed; not banks of issue, but solely for the purposes of deposit and discount. The Federal Government would thus be divorced from banking and banks, and it would be confined to the duty, delegated to it by the Constitution, of coining money and regulating the value thereof.

What obstacles interpose to the execution of this simple and unartificial scheme? Two have been suggested which alone deserve consideration. They spring from an alleged violation of public faith in making the customs duties payable in anything but gold, and in breaking the pledge given by the nation in the act of March 18, 1869, that the principal and interest of the public debt should be discharged in gold coin.

The following colloquy took place in the Senate, January 16, 1874, between Senator FERRY, of Michigan, and Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee on Finance, both republicans:

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask whether, in the Senator's judgment, the value of the currency in France depends so much on the convertibility of the notes into bonds, or on their being made lawful money for all purposes, which our greenbacks are not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that it would greatly advance our greenbacks if they were allowed to be received at the custom-houses for duties.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Is that not the case in France?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but I will ask the Senator a question now. Would he pass such a law in the face of the obligation of the United States, made on the 25th day of February, 1862, that this coin shall be set apart sacredly as a fund?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If I had control of the finances of this nation I would not discredit my own paper; I would declare it good for all purposes for or against me, and then enter the market and purchase the gold necessary to meet the obligations which I had agreed to pay in coin. In that case I would stand upon the French basis and maintain the same credit which the French nation maintains to-day, to wit, a discount of ½ per cent. on its currency, while ours to-day is about 10 per cent., for the very reason that we have not made our currency lawful money for all purposes, but have made an exception in regard to duties.

The effect of making the legal-tenders receivable for all public dues, especially for customs duties, would be to appreciate them to the value of gold at once, and thus to some extent neutralize the foul wrong perpetrated by Congress upon the tax-payers of the country, in making the five-twenty bonds, which were agreed and understood to be payable in greenbacks, payable in gold. That such was the contract of the Government with the holders of greenback circulation and the holders of these bonds cannot be successfully controverted.

On that point, if it needs confirmation, I have already referred to an extract from a speech delivered on this floor by its once-honored leader, (Mr. Thaddeus Stevens.) It was this same leader that made violent opposition to putting the brand of inferiority and depreciation upon the legal-tenders when they were first issued. The bill as originally reported and passed in this House made the greenback receivable for all dues to the Government, customs duties included. It was in the Senate that this bill, to use the language of Mr. Stevens, was so mangled, disfigured, and deformed, that its own father would not own it. And he charged that this great wrong was done at the instigation of the bullion-brokers and the bankers, and expressed the fear that it was "a cunningly devised scheme," which would carry incalculable injury and great loss to all classes throughout the Union except one. The spirit of prophecy was upon the once-honored leader of the majority of this House; and we are here to-day to bear witness that his forebodings have been realized in every jot and tittle.

Mr. Stevens, in his remarks on the bill as amended, said:

I approach the subject with more depression of spirits than I ever before approached any question. I have a melancholy foreboding that we are about to consummate a cunningly devised scheme, which will carry great injury and great loss to all classes of the people throughout this Union except one. With my colleague, I believe that no act of legislation of this Government was ever hailed with as much delight throughout the whole length and breadth of this Union, by every class of people, without any exception, as the bill which we passed and sent to the Senate. Congratulations from all classes—merchants, traders, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers—poured in upon us from all quarters. The boards of trade from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee, approved the provisions, and urged its passage as it was.

I have a dispatch from the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him to me, urging the speedy passage of the bill as it passed the House. It is true a doleful sound came up from the caverns of bullion-brokers, and from the saloons of the associated banks. Their cashiers and agents were soon on the ground, and persuaded the Senate, with but little deliberation, to mangle and destroy what it had cost the House months to digest, consider, and pass. They fell upon the bill in hot haste, and so disfigured and deformed it that its very father would not know it. Instead of being a beneficent and invigorating measure, it is now positively mischievous. It has all the bad qualities which its enemies charged on the original bill, and none of its benefits. It now creates money, and by its very terms declares it a depreciated currency. It makes two classes of money—one for the banks and brokers, and another for the people. It discriminates between the rights of different classes of creditors, allowing the rich capitalist to demand gold, and compelling the ordinary lender of money on individual security to receive notes which the Government had purposely discredited. * * *

When it is proposed to correct this rank injustice and repair this foul wrong in part; when every other class but the one for whose especial benefit this mark of inferiority and depreciation was placed upon the greenback is crying out against it, the same sordid, mercenary, and selfish horde are suddenly seized with a fit of patriotic indignation, and, assuming a virtue though they have it not, resist any interference with their legalized rights of robbery, and plant themselves upon their abhorrence of a broken and violated public faith. "The honor and faith of the nation must be preserved though the heavens fall," resounds and reverberates through the caverns of the bullion-brokers, the dens of Wall-street gamblers, and the parlors of the banks.

We propose to elevate and appreciate the value of the obligations of the Government, and we are met with the objection that Congress by a solemn resolve has pledged the customs dues to pay the gold interest on its bonds. We call the attention of these sticklers for national honor and public faith to the printed indorsement on every legal-tender note, which makes it receivable in "payment of all claims and demands against the United States except duties on imports and interest on the public debt," and makes it "a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid," and claim the right to pay the five-twenty bonds with them, and we are gravely told that the act of Congress of 18th March, 1869, pledged the faith of the Government to pay the principal and interest of these bonds in coin, notwithstanding they were purchased with greenbacks at the rate of from two to three dollars in greenbacks for one in gold.

These acts of Congress, the last of which, March 18, 1869, has been characterized by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as a piece of political humbuggery, and which richly merits the appellation of the grandest financial swindle of modern times, are pleaded by the advocates of the money-power as absolute estoppels and conclusive bars against the tax-payers ever paying anything but gold coin for the discharge of the public debt, or of appreciating the legal-tenders to par with gold.

There is but one remedy for this accumulation of aggravated outrages against a tax-ridden people, and that is contraction, constant and prolonged, until a specie basis is reached. And what adds to the intensity and magnitude of this crime against the labor interests of the country is, that it is cloaked over with a hypocritical and pretended solicitude for the preservation of the public faith.

In my experience in life, Mr. Speaker, I have observed that the most consummate villains were those who were most blatant of their virtue and indisposition to do injury or injustice to any; and when in the ordinary transactions and intercourse with my fellowmen I have heard one proclaim his own purity, vaunt his personal honesty and integrity, and his determination to deal justly and fairly with his fellows, I involuntarily suspected that he had some dishonest or selfish purpose to subserve. So it is with the men who talk so loudly and write so glibly of the nation's honor and the nation's faith. It is not that they are more sensitive to the honor and good name of the nation than other men, but that they are more alive to their own interests, and more reckless of the interests of others; it is not that they have more honor or honesty, or a keener sense of right than their fellows, but that they have greater cupidity, more insatiate avarice, and less respect for the rights or interests of their neighbors.

This clamor about the public faith is the merest pretext and the thinnest sham. It is an attempt "to steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in." It is an effort to raise a false issue, and turn the popular mind upon a false scent, that the bankers and brokers, bondholders and money-changers, may still more enrich their fields with the sweat of the poor man's brow, and fill their coffers to overflowing with gold coined from the labor of the toiling masses of the nation.

Did any one ever hear of any denunciations from these classes against Secretary BOUTWELL for violating the plain provisions of the act of March 18, 1869, in paying $40,000,000 premium on bonds not due, and which he could not pay legally until United States notes were convertible into coin, or bonds bearing a lower rate of interest could be sold at par in coin, neither of which events has arisen? When did these brokers, bankers, and money-mongers ever manifest any solicitude that the Government should keep its faith with the tax-payers of the nation? Who ever heard any protest from them against the passage of the first act, approved by President Grant, by which the burdens of the tax-payer were increased 100 per cent., and the wealth of the bondholder augmented in like proportion? It is perfectly legitimate and proper for this Government to break its faith with the tax-payers of the country, but faith must be kept with the bondholder and banker at all hazards.

This Government needs no resolve of Congress to preserve its good faith, or to comply with its honest engagements. Its acts and deeds have a voice and potency that need no aid from empty resolutions or partisan enactments. Nearly $2,000,000,000 collected from internal taxation alone in ten years; resources such as have never before been vouchsafed by a kind Providence to any other people on the habitable globe; forty millions of people, the most energetic, the most thrifty, the most intelligent that have existed in ancient or modern times, and a prompt and punctual discharge of every moneyed obligation for more than three-quarters of a century, furnish a guarantee that this Government and people will deal justly and act honestly with its creditors, compared with which demagogue resolves of Congress are as "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." Non tali auxilio tempus eget.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, various are the suggestions, and most conflicting, which we are receiving from every part of the country on the currency question, and here in Congress we have many professed doctors of finance, each having a different remedy. In the midst of this contrariety of opinion, I have adopted for my guidance certain principles which I think will aid me materially in deciding upon the various propositions which have been submitted.

THE THREE SIXTY-FIVE BOND PLAN.

I will not favor having the Government engage in any financial operation which I would condemn as impolitic for an individual.

It is believed that to pay interest on deposits held subject to call is bad policy. If the depositary keeps the money on hand, so as to be at all times ready to meet the call, he becomes the loser to the amount of the interest paid; and if he loans the money, so as to have it earn interest to meet that which he has to pay, there is no certainty that he can have it when called for. Yet we have those who propose that the United States should become the recipient of call deposits, and pay interest thereon. The proposition of this nature of which we hear the most is one to have the Government pay 3.65 per cent. on such deposits, and issue its certificates of deposit, in the form of bonds, promising to pay on demand with that rate of interest. The three sixty-five bond plan is nothing other than a proposition that the Government shall pay interest on deposits payable on demand. This would certainly be very convenient for bankers and others having idle money on hand, or which they might be holding until some desirable investment would turn up. This they could require the Government to take and pay interest on until they should see proper to call for it. The United States would have the expense of receiving these deposits, supplying the bonds, the expense and risk of guarding the money, the expense of its repayment, and would, in addition, lose the interest paid. Business of this nature, if unprofitable in the case of an individual, who might make some temporary use of the money, taking the risk, would be still more so for the Government, which could not make temporary investments; neither could it venture to pay out this fund permanently in retiring Government bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

This system would also be very desirable to those who might wish at certain periods to lock up currency. The money that otherwise, during an operation of this kind, they must hold without receiving any gain therefrom, they could place in the Government Treasury, require the money to be there held ready for them at all times, and in the mean time have it bear interest.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is characterizing the bill which I had the honor to propose.

Mr. COTTON. I refer to the 3.65 per cent. bond proposition.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. COTTON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that my proposition is for the redemption of the 6 per cent. gold bonds with the money thus obtained.

Mr. COTTON. I understand that.

Mr. KELLEY. It has two objects, which are distinctly these: the reduction of the rate of interest and the conversion into paper instead of gold of a large portion of the principal and interest of our indebtedness, and to bring the bonds into the hands of our own people instead of permitting it to remain in foreign countries, where it now is.

Mr. COTTON. I understand the gentleman fully; but I would ask him, after the money received for the three sixty-five bonds has been paid out to redeem five-twenty bonds, and you have, say $1,000,000,000 of three sixty-five bonds outstanding, then, in case there should be demand in time of a panic for redemption of the same, how are you to repay the money, the money received having been paid out for the redemption of the five-twenty bonds?

Mr. KELLEY. I will take pleasure in answering, so far as I understand it, the question of the gentleman. Banks of deposit ascertain with absolute certainty the average fixed deposits which they are able to use as loans to their customers. The laws which regulate these deposits are very well established. In addition to that we have the experience of the percentage of our various forms of temporary loan that ever came in, that ever was presented for redemption. My bill proposes a redemption fund of $50,000,000 to be kept and held exclusively for the redemption of these bonds in case they should be presented in an unusual amount under an emergency, and I believe that the Treasury is thus abundantly guarded against the contingency which the gentleman suggests.

Mr. COTTON. I do not believe the people can be drawn into that sort of a plan, nor that money can be obtained from them at 3.65 per cent. interest when they can obtain at any time 5 per cent. by purchasing the bonds of the Government. I do not believe they can be decoyed in that way, and induced to place their money in the Treasury where it will bear only 3.65 per cent. when they can get 5 per cent. or more some other way.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. COTTON. My time is running on.

Mr. KELLEY. I will pledge myself in advance not to disturb the gentleman again.

Mr. COTTON. Make it brief.

Mr. KELLEY. There is to-day lying on deposit in the Treasury of the United States $53,000,000 of greenbacks, the owners of which are entitled to no interest and which draw no interest. The owners would be glad to have 3.65 per cent. on that deposit. On the 18th of September last, when the break-down came, there were from two hundred to two hundred and fifty million dollars on deposit in the banks or with bankers, at rates of 4 per cent. or below it, which were subject to all the risks of bankers' speculations. That could all be obtained on convertible Government securities at the rate of 3.65 per cent.

Mr. COTTON. Why do you not get at the present time what is thus deposited and not bearing interest?

Mr. KELLEY. Because we cannot offer interest, but hold the money as a special deposit. This is why we do not get more; but if we cannot use it, if we borrowed at a low rate of interest on call, we could redeem 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. COTTON. How can you redeem five-twenties with the money received for the three sixty-five bonds when you are to hold all this money subject to call?

Mr. KELLEY. I think the answer to this question has been suggested in what I have already said.

AMOUNT OF GREENBACKS LIMITED.

Mr. COTTON. I would not have the Government break any of its pledges.

The law of June 30, 1864, which authorized the issuing of $400,000,000 of bonds, or in lieu thereof, Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $200,000,000, contains this provision:

> Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan.

This clause was inserted in that law to give value to the notes and bonds authorized by that act, and which were to add largely to the national debt, then already so great that many despaired of its ultimate payment.

The temporary loan having been redeemed, the limit under that loan would be $400,000,000. This restriction, aside from any other considerations, would prevent that expansion in the issue of these notes which is advocated by many.

The amount of these notes in circulation was the highest in 1865. The Secretary of the Treasury having commenced to contract the circulation, Congress, to prevent this being too rapid, provided in the act of April 17, 1866—

> That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

February 4, 1868, Congress enacted—

That from and after the passage of this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency by retiring or canceling United States notes shall be, and is hereby, suspended.

The amount then in circulation was $356,000,000. Hence that became the minimum limit.

Since that time there has been difference of opinion whether under the law there could be a reissue of any part of the $44,000,000 retired in bringing the amount down to $356,000,000. The Treasury Department has claimed that the law of June 30, 1864, authorizing the issue to the maximum of $400,000,000 remained in force, and that the $44,000,000, which the Department designates as the reserve, could be lawfully reissued, while on the other hand it has been insisted that the act of April 17, 1866, required the notes withdrawn from circulation to be canceled so as not to be reissued, and that by retiring the $44,000,000 the maximum sum was reduced to $356,000,000, and could not be increased by a reissue of any portion of what had been retired.

The Department, acting under its construction of the law, has placed a large part of this so-called reserve in circulation, and on the 23d of this month the amount thereof issued was in round numbers $26,000,000, making with the $356,000,000 the sum of $382,000,000 of United States notes outstanding at that time.

Under this state of facts, on that day this House voted on three propositions to fix the amount of these notes: first, to make the maximum issue $356,000,000; secondly, to make the maximum $382,000,000, the amount then in circulation; and thirdly, to make it $400,000,000. The last proposition prevailed. On the first and third I voted in the negative, and in the affirmative on the second sum, $382,000,000.

To make the limit $356,000,000 would necessitate rapid contraction, and might prove injurious to business. To increase the issue so as to bring it up to $400,000,000 would be to add voluntarily $18,000,000. To this there are, to my mind, several objections, among which are the following: First, to enlarge the issue of these notes in time of peace, and when there does not exist such public exigency as necessarily compels it to be done, is not warranted by the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court, as I shall show farther on. Second, such issue would violate the national pledge in the act of March 18, 1869, of which I shall speak more fully before I am through, that provision at the earliest practicable period should be made for the redemption of the United States notes in coin. Third, such voluntary increase of the United States notes would be contrary to what has been the avowed policy of the Government, and would create the impression that this nation will not pursue any fixed policy, and thus impair the public credit.

Since this House, on the 23d instant, declared in favor of making the issue of United States notes $400,000,000, these notes have declined 1 per cent., involving a loss of $3,820,000.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The decline to-day is 2 per cent.

Mr. COTTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts tells me that to-day the decline is 2 per cent., making the loss over $7,000,000.

BUYING BONDS WITH GREENBACKS.

It has been the theory of some that a large amount of these notes should be issued and placed in circulation in purchasing Government bonds. Those who favor this should bear in mind that the bonds are much above these notes in value, so that it would take more than $100 of notes to purchase bonds to the amount of $100, and by an operation of this kind the indebtedness of the nation would be much increased, as well as the currency further depreciated. For the purpose of ascertaining what would be the result of investing in bonds the additional $18,000,000 necessary to be added to the circulation to raise the amount of United States notes to $400,000,000, I addressed the following inquiry to the Secretary of the Treasury:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES, March 26, 1874.

Hon. WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON, Secretary of the Treasury:

For the purpose of seeing how much the Government would lose by purchasing United States bonds with the $18,000,000 which it would require to bring legal-tenders up to $400,000,000, I would like to know the value of five-twenty bonds the day the four hundred million bill passed the House. That was March 23.

A. R. COTTON.

I received from him the following response:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 26, 1874.

Hon. A. R. COTTON, M. C., House of Representatives:

Government would nominally lose $2,633,772 by buying bonds to the extent of eighteen millions in currency at market price on the 23d, average premium being 17.14; but bonds were then and are now above par in gold in the market, and could not have been purchased under the general order not to pay above par.

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

From what would be the loss in using $18,000,000 of these notes in purchasing bonds at the present premium, and when it is understood also that to add largely to the amount of these notes would so depreciate their value as to greatly increase this premium, it can readily be seen what a disastrous proceeding this would be. The amount of notes thus paid out would far exceed the amount of bonds purchased, and when this was done the notes would be so reduced in value that to bring them up to what they are now the Government would be compelled to fund them into bonds again. And by this process the bonded debt would be largely augmented.

REDUCTION OF THE DEBT PROMISED.

The Government has also promised its creditors that there should be an annual reduction of the public debt. This promise should be kept. It was made for a like purpose of giving value to the Government securities. It was enacted in the act of February 25, 1862, that the coin received for duties on imports should be set apart as a special fund, and applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Secondly. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall, in like manner, be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Thirdly. The residue thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States.

This act authorized the issuing of $150,000,000 legal-tender and demand notes, and $500,000,000 bonds. To enable the Government the better to dispose of these, it assured its creditors that a fund should be set apart for the reduction of the public debt to the extent at least of 1 per cent. annually of the entire debt of the United States. Any increase of the public debt by Congress would be inconsistent with this promised annual reduction. We cannot keep this promise and increase the debt in any form as the means of supplying anticipated deficiencies in the public revenues. This nation can certainly pay its way in time of peace. Let there be such retrenchment as to bring the expenditures within the revenues; but if this cannot be done, better keep the nation's pledge by placing sufficient tax where it will be the least burdensome.

SPECIE RESUMPTION PROMISED.

We find also, in the act of March 18, 1869, a pledge of this nation which is incompatible with any legislation calculated to diminish the value of greenbacks and carry us further from specie payments. It is therein enacted—

That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared, that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States, bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed, can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Since the passage of that law we have imperceptibly and without injurious results to any one made large progress and near approach to specie payments, and it would certainly be ill-advised to abandon all the ground that has been gained in that direction. I am opposed to any severe measure to bring about specie resumption, neither do I expect we are to have resumption at once; but I think we should face steadily in that direction, and not lose sight of this pledge. It has been this pledge that has appreciated the value of United States notes, and given such character to the national securities that bonds bearing a reduced rate of interest have been disposed of at par, and many of them abroad.

The United States minister to Prussia, Mr. Bancroft, in a letter addressed to Secretary Fish, December 22, 1873, in relation to the President's message, writes:

Four years ago this public believed the United States were about to return, without delay, to a specie currency. As a consequence, public confidence in our stocks was constantly on the increase. When such marvelously large payments of our debt were made it was taken for granted that those payments would be accompanied by a return of the Government, through all its obligations, to specie payments, according to the pledge of the first act of the Forty-first Congress. Nations are here divided into those which have a forced paper circulation and those which have a specie basis, and the differences in the prices of the stocks of the two is amazingly great.

Our 6 per cent. stocks were rising, and there was every reason to hope that the price would soon be far above par. The remoteness of the United States had come to be thought lightly of, and there was even a rising belief that there was a peculiar safety attending their stock, resulting from the very fact that they stood apart and beyond the reach of convulsions in Europe. There still remains unshaken confidence in their determination and in their ability to pay their bonded debt; but the seemingly indefinite postponement of the epoch when they intend to remove the use of force in keeping their notes in circulation seriously affects financial opinion. This change manifests itself in various ways. Where purchases are made of stocks, those falling due first are most sought after by those who have safety in view; and there is less disposition to engage in any new loans which the United States might be disposed to invite.

You will not be surprised, therefore, when I say that the judgment of the President "that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached" is responded to here with absolute unanimity, coupled further with the idea, which is, indeed, involved in the President's words, that we can never attain the credit which we have a right to hope for in the financial markets of the world until that specie basis is reached.

SUPREME COURT'S CONSTRUCTION.

In addition to the declaration of the legislative branch of the Government, avowing it to be the nation's duty to make the earliest provision practicable for the redemption of the United States notes in coin, the judicial branch, in passing upon the character of these notes, have pronounced them not money, in the true meaning of that word, but the nation's promises to pay money, substituted temporarily and from necessity for money; and promises that the nation is under obligations to redeem with what the world recognizes as money.

In the case of the Bank of New York vs. Supervisors, (7 Wallace 26,) decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, December, 1868, United States notes were held to be exempt from State taxation under the act of February 25, 1862, which provides that—

All United States bonds, and other securities of the United States, held by individuals, associations, or corporations within the United States, shall be exempt from taxation by or under any State authority.

It was contended in the argument of counsel that these notes were a new kind of money; that the Government did not really and in fact contract by these notes to pay the bearer on demand or at any time; that there is really no debtor or creditor in respect to them, no loan or evidence of loan; that as far as the credit of the United States was involved in the issue of these notes, no greater responsibility was assumed than is assumed by any government in coining or otherwise affixing a stamp to metal and affixing to it a certain nominal value. But the court decided that they were promises to pay money, and as such constituted a part of the securities of the United States, and were therefore, according to that act, exempted from State taxation. Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion, said:

These notes are obligations of the United States. Their name imports obligation. Every one of them expresses on its face an engagement of the nation to pay to the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coined dollar of the United States, a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold and silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government.

In the leading Legal-tender cases, that of Hepburn vs. Griswold, (8 Wallace, 603,) decided December term, 1868, in which five judges declared that Congress had not the constitutional power to make these notes a legal tender for pre-existing debts, three judges dissenting; and the cases of Knox vs. Lee, and Parker vs. Davis, (12 Wallace, 457,) heard and determined together at the December term, 1870, in which five judges held these notes to be a legal tender as well for debts contracted before they were issued as for debts contracted afterward, four judges holding them not to be a legal tender in any case, while there was this difference of opinion in regard to the authority of Congress to make these notes legal tender, yet in all the opinions they are characterized as promises of the Government to pay money, and not money in reality.

In the cases in 12 Wallace the opinion of the majority of the court was delivered by Justice Strong, and while the opinion sustained the legal-tender quality of these notes to the fullest extent, we find therein the following:

The legal-tender acts do not attempt to make paper a standard of value. We do not rest their validity upon the assertion that their emission is coinage or any regulation of the value of money; nor do we assert that Congress may make anything which has no value money. We do assert this: that Congress has power to enact that the Government's promises to pay money shall be, for the time being, equivalent in value to the representative of value determined by the coinage acts, or to multiples thereof.

It is not the attempt to coin money out of a valueless material, like the coinage of leather, or iron, or cowry shells. It is a pledge of the national credit; it is a promise by the Government to pay dollars; it is not an attempt to make dollars. The standard of value is not changed. The Government simply demands that its credit shall be accepted and received by public and private creditors during the pending exigency. Every government has a right to demand this, when its existence is at stake. The interests of every citizen are bound up with the fate of the Government. None can claim exemption. If they cannot trust their Government in its time of trial, they are not worthy to be its citizens.

No one supposes that these Government certificates are never to be paid; that the day of specie payments is never to return. And it matters not in what form they are issued. The principle is still the same. Instead of certificates they may be Treasury notes or paper of any other form. And their payment may not be made directly in coin, but they may be first convertible into Government bonds or other Government securities. Through whatever changes they may pass, their ultimate destiny is to be paid. * * * But it is the prerogative of the legislative department to determine when the fit time for payment has come. It may be long delayed, perhaps many may think too long after the exigency has passed. But the abuse of a power, if proven, is no argument against its existence, and the courts are not responsible therefor.

Justice Bradley further says:

It follows, as another corollary, from the views which I have expressed, that the power to make Treasury notes a legal tender, while a mere incidental one to that of issuing the notes themselves, and as one of the forms of borrowing money, is, nevertheless, a power not to be resorted to except upon extraordinary and pressing occasions, such as a war or other public exigency of great gravity or importance, and should be no longer exerted than all the circumstances of the case demand.

In Hepburn vs. Griswold, Justice Miller, who was of those who maintained that these notes are a legal tender for pre-existing debts, thus treats of them:

The legal-tender clauses of the statutes under consideration were placed emphatically, by those who enacted them, upon their necessity to the further borrowing of money and maintaining the Army and Navy. It was done reluctantly, and with hesitation, and only after the necessity had been demonstrated, and had become operative. Our statesmen had been trained in a school which looked upon such legislation with something more than distrust. The debates of the two Houses of Congress show that on this necessity alone could this clause of the bill have been carried; and they also prove, as I think very clearly, the existence of that necessity. The history of that gloomy time, not to be readily forgotten by the lover of his country, will forever remain the full, clear, and ample vindication of the exercise of this power by Congress as its results have demonstrated the sagacity of those who originated and carried through this measure.

In these cases we have what might be termed the democratic side of the court, were there any politics in court, holding that these notes are not legal tender, and cannot be made legal tender in any case; while what we might call the republican side, although sustaining their legal-tender character to the fullest extent, yet saying that they are the Government promises to pay money, not an attempt to make dollars; that no one supposes they are never to be paid; that they originated in necessity; and that the making of them legal tender is a power not to be resorted to except upon extraordinary occasions, such as war or other public exigency of great gravity, and should be no longer exercised than all the circumstances of the case demand.

Here we have four judges out of nine asserting that under no state of circumstances did Congress possess the constitutional power to make these notes legal tender even for debts contracted after the making the laws under which they were issued; while the five judges who maintain the power in Congress to declare them legal tender place this right upon the extreme necessity of the Government during the war. Where, then, do those who favor making at this time an additional issue of these notes find the constitutional authority for so doing? If we take the most favorable construction given by the court to the power of Congress, we find no authority for increasing this kind of paper in time of peace, and when there does not exist the necessity which would compel resort to some such means to sustain the Government. The reasoning of the court indicates that our duty under the Constitution would lead us in the direction of providing in due time for specie resumption.

That these notes are in fact indebtedness, and represent a loan to the Government, is also evident from their nature, and from their having no intrinsic value. Before the Government can pay out a gold dollar it must become the owner of the same by giving an equivalent therefor; it must either purchase the gold and then coin the dollar, or obtain from a citizen a coined dollar in payment of what is due the Government. Before it could have paid $100,000,000 in gold it must have become possessed of the same by an equivalent expenditure. Finding itself destitute of the gold, it substituted, for the time being, that which cost it nothing beyond the preparation of the notes, and which has no value aside from the promise that it will be replaced with something of value.

PAPER SCHEME.

There are those who teach that regard should no longer be had for a metallic standard, and that the Government should even issue its paper stamped with various denominations, and endeavor to keep it afloat as money. Should any other nation resort to a device of this sort, we would declare it to be on the verge of bankruptcy. I desire to call particular attention to the fact that this nation is now doing what is not being done by any other, that is, keeping its indebtedness in circulation as a substitute for money. We are informed of the amount of currency in France and other countries, but in not one of these do the nation's notes form a part of the currency.

We cannot do otherwise than compare all values with the world's money standard—coin. The transactions in commerce, amounting annually to hundreds of millions of dollars between this and other nations, are conducted on the coin basis. The Government bonds, which exceed $1,700,000,000, are to be paid in gold, as well as the interest on the same; and whenever we come in contact with other nations, as must be done continually, we are forced to realize that there is but one standard of value.

But it is said there is not sufficient specie in this country, and never can be, to transact the business of the country. That is true, and the same is true of every other country. It is further true that the business of no nation is carried on entirely through the instrumentality of what is usually termed money, but the greater part is conducted by the use of bank-bills, checks, drafts, and paper of various kinds. It does not follow that, when currency shall be at par with gold, only specie is to be used as the circulating medium; but then what may be called a dollar will be a dollar, and not ninety cents, as compared with a real dollar; and whoever issues that which may be current as a dollar will be held responsible to maintain it at par with coin, and to make it as good as coin.

FREE BANKING.

This would not necessarily restrict the amount of the currency; but, on the contrary, there could then be free banking without risk of inflation, as the liability to redeem in coin would prevent excessive issue of bills. Any redundancy would be returned for redemption. When a bank pays out its notes in discounting, a debt is created in its favor which will require as great an amount of notes to discharge, and this operates to protect the bank to a large extent from being called upon to redeem its notes.

We have learned that the present system of national banks, based on United States bonds, affords absolute security to the bill-holder, and if, added to this, we could have that bill made as good as a gold dollar, and then make banking free, we would have attained that self-regulating system of currency which is so much desired. The coin in the country which is now withheld because the currency is depreciated would be added to the circulation. All transactions would be regulated by the specie standard, but paper equivalent in value would supply the want of coin. Between the United States and Great Britain gold and silver only are recognized as money, yet the Geneva award, $15,500,000, was paid our Government without the use of one dollar in coin.

CAUSE OF THE PANIC.

The late panic is attributed in great part by many to the scarcity of money.

The fact that money was attainable at a reasonable rate of interest immediately preceding the panic, and that legitimate business is again generally in a properous condition, leads to the conclusion that the disasters which caused that disturbance in financial affairs were the result of injudicious operations, rather than the fault of the currency. Single firms had assumed liabilities for several millions of dollars without the ready means for payment, and had invested their own capital, and the funds of others with which they had been intrusted, in unavailable securities, and nothing could be more natural than that they would some time be found short, and forced to suspend. Had money been more plenty, and they been able to gather more into their hands, they would, perhaps, have become more expanded, and the calamity have been greater.

I am not aware that any one who has a marketable commodity finds difficulty in making sale, by reason of there being no currency wherewith to pay him. If he has nothing to sell or exchange for money he could not obtain it were it ever so abundant, unless he should borrow, which oftentimes proves disastrous. Farmers are not prevented from selling their products in consequence of too limited currency, and I understand they are obtaining fair prices, notwithstanding the recent financial fright. That business generally is again, and so soon, in a prosperous condition shows us that we have given the state of the currency too much blame, and reckless operators too little credit, for the troubles of last September.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

There is a feeling in the West and the South that those portions of the country have not their fair share of national-bank circulation.

The act of February 25, 1863, which established this banking system, limited the amount of circulating notes to $300,000,000, of which $150,000,000 were to be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population; and the remainder apportioned to associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing bank capital, resources, and business.

The act of February 12, 1870, authorized an additional $54,000,000 to be furnished to banking associations in those States and Territories having less than their proportion. That law also authorizes the withdrawal of currency to an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 from banking associations in States having more than their proportion, and supplying this to States and Territories having less. The latter portion of this law has not been executed. The Comptroller of the Currency recommends that instead of this withdrawal, there be issued $25,000,000 additional circulation, to be furnished the States and Territories which have not their share. Provision should be made for supplying to these States and Territories their full proportion.

STABLE VALUE.

In legislating upon the currency nothing should be done to impair its value. We do not wish cheap money, nor currency of a fluctuating value. That which we call money, and which is the measure of value for everything else, should not be an uncertain measure by reason of changes in its own value. These changes increase the fluctuation of prices, and give opportunity for speculation and gain to those who have the leisure to watch these fluctuations or to plot to bring them about. The profits which are made by this means come out of the prices of the commodities which are the subjects of these speculations and diminish the prices to the producers. Those who are occupied in industrial pursuits have not the time or opportunity to study the chances in relation to these fluctuations, and take no part in manipulating them, but they suffer the loss of what is made in this way. Hence the industrious, and those engaged in legitimate trade, are especially interested in having a currency of stable value. I am opposed to the adoption of any new scheme for the inflation of the currency which will unsettle its value. Better do nothing than to thus derange the business of the country. Whatever may be done in the way of increasing the currency should be on such a basis as will be certain not to diminish its value. Until the vote of the House on the 23d in favor of retrograding on the greenback question, Congress, although not undertaking to force specie resumption, has, by pursuing a course of legislation consistent with its pledge in favor of resumption, inspired such confidence that this result would be accomplished at no distant day that the advance in the value of United States notes since March, 1869, when this pledge was given, has added over $70,000,000 to the wealth of the country.

From the time that pledge was given, and until some doubt arose in regard to the course of the Government, consequent upon much talk of inflation, the annual average on the premium on gold showed a constant appreciation in the value of currency.

The Government has taken upon itself the important duty of supplying the people with currency, and has taxed the State banks out of existence. It has therefore a double duty to perform—that of maintaining the value of its own obligation in the form of notes, and of giving the country a sound currency. The nation cannot be a party to any wild-cat operations, nor venture upon any hazardous experiments with the currency. It should pursue a uniform and settled policy. That policy heretofore has been, not to regard the state of depreciated and irredeemable paper as the normal and permanent monetary condition of this country, but to legislate at all times in the belief and with the desire that ere long the currency may be brought from its present disgraced state to rank respectably with the currency of other nations. To this policy we should adhere.

I have now concluded my remarks, and as the gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] suggested he would like to ask me a question, I am ready to have him do so.

Mr. MELLISH. I would ask the gentleman if the decision of the Supreme Court was not that the Government had power to make Treasury notes dollars, and that Congress was the judge when and how to exercise that power?

Mr. COTTON. Their decision is here in their own language. It is that there was no thought of making dollars, that no one ever supported the legal-tender act on the ground that the issuing of United States notes was like unto coining money, but entirely ex necessitate that the Government must have credit during the war, and these notes were a forced loan from the people. While the majority of the court say that Congress, as the law-making power, has the discretion to say how long these notes shall stand unredeemed, yet inferentially they say it shall be the duty of Congress to redeem them. There cannot be found in these decisions one word giving the least color or shadow of right to add at the present time to the volume of United States notes. The gentleman can take my references and look the decisions over at his leisure.

Mr. MELLISH. My question is not quite answered, if the gentleman pleases. I asked him if in this decision the Supreme Court did not declare that Congress is the judge when and how to exercise this particular power?

Mr. COTTON. They did declare that with Congress rested the discretion when to redeem, but said at the same time that the notes should be retired as soon as practicable after the exigency had passed.

You will not find in these decisions authority for increasing these notes at this time, in a time of peace.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COTTON. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Is there anything at all in that decision from which one could draw the least encouragement or hope that would justify the United States in making those notes a legal tender in time of peace? I know there is no such decision. The court would not make any such arbitrary dictum; but is there anything to encourage the idea?

Mr. COTTON. Nothing whatever. I quoted literally what I read from the language of the judges themselves; and when we consider that out of nine judges four declared that Congress should not issue this paper and make it a legal tender under any sort of exigency, and that the five who sustained these notes as a legal tender barely did it on the ground of necessity, I think——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Of war necessity.

Mr. COTTON. Yes; as a war measure. I think the ground is very narrow indeed for any one to stand on at the present time, and say that we can now issue more of this paper and make it a legal tender.

Mr. MELLISH. Did I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that the Supreme Court decided that the Government had power to make Treasury notes dollars, and that Congress was the judge of when and how to exercise this power? I understood the gentleman to say that that was the decision.

Mr. COTTON. This is what the court says:

But it is the prerogative of the legislative department to determine when the fit time for payment has come.

Not to issue more, but when the time has come to pay what are already issued.

The court say it—

May be long delayed; perhaps many may think too long after the exigency has passed, but that the abuse of power—

Does my friend want to abuse it?—

if proven, is no argument against its existence, and the courts are not responsible therefor.

I now yield the floor.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. My purpose is not to deliver an essay upon finances or currency, but to state in a practical way some few suggestions arising out of the bill which has been presented by the committee.

We have two things to look to: First, we should resume specie payments as soon as we can with prudence; secondly, should not contract the currency any more than we can by possibility help at the present time.

The bill to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at four hundred millions has already passed this House. My impression is it will pass Congress.

The bill reported by the committee to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, looks upon its face somewhat to expansion. We have added forty-four millions of legal-tender notes, which were called in by Mr. McCulloch. The bill also seeks to remove the restrictions which prevent the creation of bank circulation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how are we to resume? How are we to perform the very difficult office of resuming specie payments, and at the same time not contract the currency? I say we must resume specie payments by keeping in the Treasury the gold over and above that which is necessary to pay interest upon the national debt, and such other expenses of the national Government as must be paid in gold. As legal-tenders are paid into the Treasury, retain them there, or cancel them; and supply the place of the legal-tenders thus retained or canceled by bank-notes. We should remove the legal-tender character of the bank-notes, so far as they have that character under the act of Congress. That would be a step toward the resumption of specie payments.

Now, take the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1875, of the amountof gold which will be received into the Treasury. It is estimated at $180,000,000. To pay the interest on the public debt we must use $97,798,080; to pay the interest on the Pacific Railway bonds we must use $3,877,410, making in all $101,675,490. Deducting that from the one hundred and eighty millions, we have a surplus annually on that estimate of $78,324,510. We then have legal-tenders, if this bill shall pass which legalizes the legal-tender notes, to the amount of $400,000,000; and we have a fractional currency amounting to $44,000,000, making in all $444,000,000. This is subject to deduction by reason of currency lost and removed from circulation by hoarding.

Now, I submit that it is impracticable to accumulate that amount of gold in the Treasury to redeem that amount of paper. Then, we must get the legal-tenders out of the way on some other plan than that of paying for them in gold at once. That plan, then, must be to withhold them by degrees, and as we withhold them supply their place by bank-notes. That plan will work no contraction.

It has been stated that the amount of national-bank notes is three hundred and fifty-four millions. The amount, then, of the legal-tenders, as we suppose, will be, if Congress assents to the action of this House, four hundred millions. We will have also this forty-four millions of fractional currency.

Then let us go upon this plan. Let the withdrawal of the legal-tenders and the issue of bank-notes proceed as nearly as may be pari passu. The first effect of that will be to gradually increase the value of the legal-tenders. The increase will not be sudden, as it would be if the Government sought to redeem them at once in gold. It will be so gradual that at first it will be almost imperceptible. And as these legal-tenders increase in value they will be held by the banks. This process will be so slow that, in my judgment, it will not disturb the market. Now, if the Government, according to the plan of many gentlemen, should proceed to purchase the gold, it would produce an abnormal state of affairs. Gold would necessarily rise in price, and the period of resuming specie payments would be put further off. Gold would necessarily rise in value in comparison with paper under that system, and the existing relations between paper and gold would be much disturbed.

Under the plan I have suggested, (and it is not at all original with me, for it has been suggested by several others,) gold would be exported less than it now is; it would remain more in the country. Mr. McCulloch's plan was defective in this. He called in the legal-tender notes, but did not replace those legal-tenders by a currency of equal value. Mr. McCulloch's plan was simply contraction, and the gold was not kept in the Treasury, and did not become a part of the currency of the country.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, if we attempt to force specie payments against the will of the business community it will be found a very difficult task. An effort to do so in this country would probably result in failure. Simply to fund the legal-tenders and withdrawing them from the open market in that way would give us no equivalent whatever. The funding of the legal-tenders would also increase the debt of the nation, for these legal-tenders now pay no interest. The country would not stand that unless there was a great necessity for it, or unless you gave an equivalent for these legal-tenders. For instance, suppose $20,000,000 in gold accumulated in the Treasury and its equivalent in legal-tenders should be purchased. That gold would be of no benefit as currency, for it would not in any sense enter into circulation. The gold would command a premium, and the inevitable result of that plan would be to produce contraction. That experiment has been tried by Mr. McCulloch and has failed. If we can retain the gold in the Treasury, gradually withdrawing the legal-tenders, and supply their place by bank-notes, then a wholesome result would necessarily ensue. Less gold would by consequence be exported. The banks themselves, looking forward toward specie payments, would retain the gold which they derive from interest on their Government bonds. It would be of little consequence that this approach to specie payment was slow; for if we consult the will of the country and the general laws of trade and business we should not unduly hasten that event.

Now, with reference to this fractional currency, amounting to $44,000,000, under any effort to redeem that it would be the last to come in. That amount would be required in the small dealings of the country, and this fractional currency need not be redeemed in amounts less than five dollars, and need not be made a legal tender for sums larger than five dollars.

Now it strikes me this gradual process of approaching specie payments would prevent speculation arising from an anticipated increase in the value of gold. The natural impression would be to the contrary; but as long as you make the legal-tenders increase in value so that they approximate the price of gold, the danger of speculating in gold for a rise is increased. That danger would to a great extent prevent that speculation.

I beg leave to read a passage from Francis's History of the Bank of England:

In 1817 the directors, desirous, perhaps, of testing the feeling of the public with regard to metallic payments, announced, that after the 2d of May of that year they would pay cash for all their notes of one and two pounds dated prior to the 1st of January, 1816, or exchange them for new notes of the same value. The confidence, however, of the public was great and scarcely any demand was made on their coffers. In October of the same year a further notice was issued, that on and after the 1st day of October they would be ready to pay gold for all their notes dated prior to the 1st of January, 1817. Every exertion, since the commencement of peace, had been made to resume specie payments with safety. The collection of bullion had been rapid, and to a large amount; and it was soon found that these precautionary measures had not been thrown away. The difference between a legitimate demand for gold by the public, and a demand for the same material by speculators, was rapidly witnessed.

When the one and two pound notes, that description of paper held principally by the poor man, were called in, the amount of cash claimed was not more than one million. When, however, it was announced that all notes prior to a particular date would be paid in specie, the bullion speculator stepped in, took advantage of the exchanges, and sent more than five millions to the Continent. On the report of Mr. Peel, the house passed a bill, in two nights, restraining the bank from paying the notes alluded to.

That a great increase in bullion tended to justify this measure is indisputable. In 1816 and 1817, some of the country bankers found it difficult to dispose of their coin. Preference was shown to their notes; and it cost one firm £100 to transmit its surplus specie to London. At another period, in bringing one thousand guineas to a London banker, the latter begged as a favor that the gold might not be left, as he had sent so much to the bank, and did not like to trouble the establishment with any more.

This illustrates that so far as the fractional currency is concerned, even if it was redeemable in specie, redemption would not be called for. I claim that the effort to redeem legal-tender notes, by holding in the Treasury gold enough to pay them off after the amount was reduced by calling them in, would inevitably gradually bring down the premium on gold. During this process it is not probable that all speculation in gold would be prevented.

Now let us see the office which has been performed by specie in times past. It has been stated on good authority that a million and a half of specie settles at the clearing-house $80,000,000 of currency; on a credit of $400,000,000 between Europe and America $50,000,000 in gold has settled the balance; illustrating when you get to specie payments how little gold is necessary to carry on the commercial affairs of the country. In one sense we have never been a specie-paying people. Unlike some of the states in Europe we have never had gold enough to redeem our bank-notes. The confidence of the public has stepped in and supplied this great want of gold, and the gold on hand has been sufficient to settle the balances, not only in our internal mercantile affairs, but in the transactions of foreign commerce. Good judges have estimated that from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 of gold held by the banks would enable them to resume.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in case a system of free banking should be adopted, it would be one of the essential features of that system that the Government would not attempt the distribution of the currency either according to the wealth or population of the States or Territories. This matter would be left to take care of itself. The ordinary laws of supply and demand which govern the affairs of mankind in commerce and business would control that subject. The capitalists who engage in this business will control it according to the demands of the business public. In waste places where currency is not wanted, where banking facilities are not required and would not be profitable, banks would not be established.

Now I propose to examine the bill of the committee for a few moments.

The first section does away with the reserve for circulation. I respectfully submit that that is right, for the reason that the circulation is secured by the bonds of the Government, which are in value about 20 per cent. beyond the bank-notes based thereon. That ought to be a sufficient reserve.

The second section removes the limitation prescribed by the banking act, which limitation reads thus:

That the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under this act shall not exceed $300,000,000.

That restriction must necessarily be removed upon the principle of free banking. Under the principle of free banking there must be no restriction save the securitiy of the notes, which is now guaranteed by public stocks and the reserve to secure deposits.

Though we have not yet reached the period for the payment of specie, we should so frame our legislation as to approach that period. If, then, our circulation by bank-notes is well secured and the plan be to substitute bank-notes for legal-tenders, the limitation on the circulation clearly should be removed. The repeal of the limitation on circulation must necessarily be followed by the repeal of the proviso to the second section of the act of July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and an increase of national-bank notes," which proviso reads:

That no circulation shall be withdrawn under the provisions of this section until after the $54,000,000 granted by the first section shall have been taken up.

Now let us examine the third section of the bill, which is as follows:

That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions.

I submit to the learned gentlemen of the committee that they have made a mistake in the introduction of that section. The thirty-second section of the banking act provides for agencies for redemption. It appears to me that the Government should not go into this matter of being a redemption agent. The system of redemption should be provided for by the banks themselves, and that system it will be necessary to put in force only when you get to the resumption of specie payments. I submit that the Government should not be a redemption agent, that the banks can manage the matter themselves; and there is a provision of the banking act that redemption agencies shall be provided in certain metropolitan places.

Again, the retention of 5 per cent. of circulation by the Government for that purpose necessarily works contraction. Under the present system, bank-notes being as valuable as legal-tender notes, redemption is of no consequence whatever; a practical redemption takes place all the while at the present time. You deposit bank-notes and you can call for legal-tender notes, and you have your bank-notes constantly redeemed by legal-tender notes. Their value being equal to the legal-tender notes in the estimation of the public they are never returned to the banks for redemption, or sent in to the Government unless when they are mutilated. Then it strikes me that, practically, redemption agents will not be necessary unless the value of the bank note and that with which you are to redeem it is unequal. If that with which you are to redeem it is of more value than the bank-note then the redemption agent becomes a matter of necessity. But as long as the bank-note and the legal-tender note are so close together in value there is no practical necessity for redemption agents. Experience has already demonstrated that.

I would submit that those parts of section 3 which apply to a reimbursement of the Treasury Department for printing notes for the banks, and limiting the amount of legal-tenders to $400,000,000, are proper and should be retained.

Section 4 provides for the withdrawal of circulation and taking up the Government bonds which have been deposited for securing the bank-notes, and I presume that nobody will object to this provision.

Section 5 requires the reserves to be kept in the vaults of the bank, and I find there is a strong impression on the minds of many in favor of that proposition. I submit that it is objectionable, and that it would work contraction. A bank must redeem by its agent in the metropolis, wherever that metropolis may be. It must keep deposits there to redeem its notes and carry on its business. The country bank which has not credit at the metropolis cannot assist its dealers, and it would be but of little value to its customers. If the country bank must keep all its reserves in its own vault, and at the same time keep deposits in the metropolis so that its bills may be redeemed there and its business carried on at the clearing-house and its transactions facilitated at the metropolis, then contraction must necessarily ensue.

Practically the country bank keeps an account in the city bank. The city bank does the business for the country bank at the clearing-house, and it is also a redeeming agent for the country bank, where the necessity for a redeeming agent exists. If you compel the country bank to keep its reserves in its own vault, it must also place deposits in the metropolitan bank to accomplish its purposes, and the result necessarily must be contraction. No practical benefit can arise from compelling the country bank to keep all its reserves in its own vaults.

Now another idea upon that point. It being the settled rule of business that the bank in the country does keep deposits in the metropolis, legislation against that rule of business must necessarily be unsound; for any system of legislation which attacks a settled rule of business growing out of the necessities of the case must be essentially unsound.

The eighth section of the bill, I respectfully submit, is based on erroneous principles. It reads thus:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, at the beginning of each and every month, from and including July, 1874, two millions of United States notes not bearing interest, payable in gold two years after date, of such denominations as he shall deem expedient, not less than ten dollars each, in exchange, and as a substitute, for the same amount of the United States notes now in circulation, which shall be canceled and destroyed, and not reissued. And any excess of gold in, or hereafter coming into, the Treasury of the United States, after payment of interest on the public debt, and supplying any deficiency in the revenues provided to meet the current expenses of the Government, shall hereafter be retained as a reserve for the redemption of such notes.

It provides for the redemption of $2,000,000 of legal-tender notes by $2,000,000 of gold notes.

Now, these gold notes will be at a premium; they will not enter into the circulation of the country, for business purposes. Two million dollars of gold must go out of the Treasury every month, and that $2,000,000 of gold will not enter into the circulation. The Treasury will part with its gold, and resumption of specie payments will be put further off.

Mr. McCulloch substantially tried that system; he sold gold and bought legal-tender notes, and he thereby worked contraction to a degree that the country resisted his plan. The gold that he parted with did not aid in bringing about a resumption of specie payments, and it did not enter into and become a part of the currency of the country. And we at this late day have actually legalized the $44,000,000 of legal-tender notes which Mr. McCulloch called in, and which under the recent emergency the Treasury Department has reissued.

Now, take the other plan. If for every legal-tender note taken from the circulation of the country you supply a bank-note, and at the same time retain gold in the Treasury, ultimately the Treasury will be enabled to redeem the legal-tender notes without purchasing one dollar of gold. As I have said before, as soon as the Treasury shall accumulate $150,000,000 in gold, in all human probability the outstanding legal-tender notes, under the system proposed, can be paid off in specie. I submit that the legal-tender qualities, such as they are, of the bank-note should be removed.

A suggestion has been made to me by a very practical man of a simple method by means of which bank-notes can be substituted for legal-tender notes. When the Government shall issue notes to the banks, do it on this plan: Let the bank pay into the Treasury $100 of legal-tender notes; let the Government issue to the bank bonds payable in gold for $100, and let those bonds bear a rate of interest of 4½ per cent., which would be about equivalent to the present price of gold. Let the banks then deposit their bonds with the Government, and then let the Government issue to the banks 90 per cent., or say 80 per cent. of circulation for each $100 of bonds deposited. I speak of a bond of $100 as an illustration. In this way the legal-tender notes can be retired, and at the same time furnish a basis for bank-notes. These bonds, like the other bonds of the United States, should be made payable, principal and interest, in gold, and free from taxation.

Under this system the banks will shape their business so as to resume as soon as it is safe and practicable for them to do so. The legal-tender notes will gradually be absorbed by the banks. In the first place they will not be equal to gold, but will daily be growing more and more valuable. And when the Government shall be strong enough to redeem the legal-tender notes, the gold will then go to the banks, and the banks must necessarily resume.

Under such a system there can be no danger of too great inflation by bank-notes. Every well-managed bank will do its business in view of the fact of a gradual approach to, and an inevitable certainty of, specie payments.

There seems to be among many well-informed gentlemen an impression that free banking will lead to inflation. I submit it will not, because the business of banking is not as profitable at the present time as formerly, for obvious reasons; and there is no danger of too great inflation by means of bank-notes, particularly if legislation is so shaped as to look to resumption of specie payments. One obstacle in the way of engaging in this business is the system of taxation. The national and State taxes on banks are a great burden. These taxes are 1 per cent. and ½ of one per cent. on the capital, except that portion of the capital invested in United States bonds; 1 per cent. on circulation and ½ of one per cent. on deposits. These taxes are paid to the Federal Government. The tax on shares is paid to the State governments; in some instances paid by the banks themselves, and in others paid by the shareholders.

When these shares are assessed they are not assessed like improved landed property, which is generally assessed at some 60 per cent. of its value, but they are assessed at their full value. I asked from one of the banks which had a capital of $500,000 a statement of the taxes which it paid. It paid to the Federal Government $7,380 and in local taxes, $16,400, making $23,080. If you take improved land valued at 60 per cent., as generally rated by assessors, which land is actually worth $500,000, the tax would be $9,840, and if you value the land at $500,000,000 the tax would be $16,400 instead of $23,080. In the case of this bank the tax was on the gross earnings 20.34 per cent., and on the net earnings 26.48 per cent. This bank had a good surplus earned when banking was profitable, which is an important fact to be taken into consideration, when the percentage of tax on gross and net earnings is considered. I submit that so far as this bill proposes free banking there will be no serious danger of expansion from that source, and the great laws which govern all kinds of business may with safety be applied to the currency provided you make the currency secure, as has been proposed.

So, Mr. Speaker, in a very practical way I have submitted these views, and have more than occupied the time allowed me.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Yes, sir; any you may choose to ask.

Mr. MELLISH. Would not the hoarding of gold by the Government have the effect to raise the price of gold, or rather would it not be substantially "bulling" gold?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I suppose not, and for this reason: You hoard gold by the Government with a view to redeem legal-tender notes. These legal-tender notes are daily increasing in value, and the exportation of gold will cease, or partially cease, and nobody will speculate for a rise when the operations of the Government under a bill of this kind would tend to increase the price and value of the legal tender in its relation to gold. When the legal-tenders and gold are of equal value, speculation in gold is at an end.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, since this bill has been before the House I made a few remarks upon the banking and currency of the country, showing as far as my observation went that the present national banking law has been of great benefit to the country, and I think still that it will be much better for us to leave that admirable law as it now exists and simply add the privilege of free banking, which, I believe, will give us more currency where it is needed without causing an inflation generally beyond the legitimate wants of the business community; and yet some gentlemen on this floor say it is this law which has brought upon us all our woes and is the cause of the present prostration of business, going on to cite many instances of bankruptcy and ruin brought about by the workings of this law as they believe.

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that any gentleman representing a constituency west of the Hudson River should take such a stand, condemning a system which I have data here to show has been the making of the West. I must confess that I am at a loss to understand the opposition of gentlemen from the West, and their reasons for denouncing this national banking system, when I can perceive such evidence of the prosperity brought to the West upon the wings of this very system. Gentlemen must admit the positive growth in wealth, and the great increase, not only in agriculture, but in the manufactures of the West; and why they will persist in ignoring the influence of this system in promoting this unusual prosperity I cannot conceive.

Mr. Speaker, how could it be possible for the whole country, or for any portion of it, to flourish in every branch of its industry, as it has, and as I propose to demonstrate it has, during the last decade, if this were a deficient banking system; nay, not only a deficient, but a pernicious system, as I have heard it called by members of this House?

I know, sir, that I am in opposition to many gentlemen in this House in this position I have taken, and not only to the gentlemen here, but to that large body of well-known business men of New York who signed a memorial to Congress which they calculate and intend to have great weight with this Congress and with the country. This memorial says that they believe that any additional issue of paper money, either directly by the Government or indirectly by the national banks by authority of the Government, would be most injurious to the interests of the nation. They say, "speculation of all kinds is stimulated by the excessive volume of the currency, and the minds of the whole nation are demoralized and rendered unfit for the pursuits of steady industry." Therefore they pray that no more issue of paper shall take place, and that the greenbacks issued out of the reserve be withdrawn as speedily as possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask, how many millions of dollars constitute a proper and how many million dollars constitute an excessive volume of currency?

In 1850 the value of the real and personal property of the United States was $7,135,780,228. When the nation was worth a little over seven thousand million dollars, can these business men from their own experience, or from any knowledge drawn from books, tell us what number of millions of dollars in currency would have been adequate? Can they fix a sum which, if increased or lessened, injury would have followed?

In 1860 the wealth of the nation, according to an official census, had increased to $16,159,616,068. Seven thousand millions had swollen to sixteen thousand millions! Population, railroads, buildings, commerce, manufactures, and agriculture had increased correspondingly. Will these memorialists tell us what the currency ought to have been at the end of that prosperous decade? Can they agree upon a statement of what number of millions of dollars of currency would have best served the interests of all classes at that time? What amount of currency for each million of dollars of wealth is needed? In 1870 the wealth of the United States had increased to $30,068,518,507. Thus after deducting the enormous losses of the war, after deducting the value of the slaves, there was an increase of national wealth of nearly fourteen thousand million dollars, probably the greatest aggregate increase of wealth recorded in the history of any nation.

Go back ten years from to-day, when losses from war had nearly ceased, and take a term of ten years ending now instead of in 1870, and there can be little or no doubt but that the increase in wealth in this country was $20,000,000,000. In this time no serious additions were made to the currency. Whether there was too much or too little, whether it was a good or a bad one, whether it was redeemable or irredeemable, with it we have built forty thousand miles of railroad, established a gigantic system of manufactures, greatly increased the wages of laborers and mechanics, and doubled the value of all the real and personal property in this country.

What other currency under the heavens, gold, silver, or paper, ever achieved such a result for any people, great or small, ancient or modern?

Idealists and speculators will in all times future, as in all times past, attack any existing system however brilliant the results it may be achieving. But what disinterested man of good sense either distrusts, denounces, or dislikes the United States legal-tender and national-bank notes, which have done so much for the nation? How can we assent to the proposition that there are too many in circulation for the public good when we know that by their use the value of all the real and personal property of the nation has been doubled?

After twelve years of beneficial use a plain man would be more likely to ask for their increase than for their diminution. Yet, twelve years hence, when property shall have doubled in value again, theorists will still be found crying, "Too much currency."

Congress should legislate for the people, uninfluenced by mere impractical theorists. Under the influence of idle talkers the Treasury Department actually commenced calling in the greenbacks, and Congress had to interfere and arrest the effort to diminish a circulation which had done so much for the country.

The Department, instead of redeeming 6 per cent. bonds with its surplus funds, called in and paid off no less than $59,000,000 of three per cents which had been held by the banks as part of their reserve. This compelled the banks to withdraw fifty-nine millions of greenbacks from circulation to put into their vaults for a reserve. If for many years the country has prospered in an entirely unparalleled ratio by the use of an unusual amount of currency, why not retain it? If our present monetary system has done better than any other monetary system ever tried in any nation, why change it? If by our system we have accumulated more property in ten years than England has with her system in fifty years, why should we abandon our system and adopt either hers, or indeed any other?

What is the value of the real and personal property of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and what is the amount of their currency? Senator MORRILL, of Vermont, in a recent speech, estimates their wealth at $40,000,000,000, and H. V. Poor states the amount of their gold, silver, and paper money at seven hundred and fifty-nine millions. The population he puts at thirty-two millions.

We have large territorial areas, forty million people, $30,000,000,000 of wealth, an immense interior navigation, more miles of railroad than all Europe combined, and yet have less than four hundred millions of greenbacks and less than three hundred and fifty millions of national-bank notes. We have a smaller volume of circulating medium than Great Britain, although our wants in that respect are far greater.

How is it with France, with a population of 35,844,000? Mr. Poor states its condition thus:

	Francs.
Gold coin in circulation	800, 000, 000
Silver coin in circulation	300, 000, 000
Bank of France paper in circulation	600, 000, 000
Total	1, 700, 000, 000

Yet France has a smaller territorial area than Texas, has not so many miles of railroad as Illinois, nor so much interior navigation as New York, or even Missouri or Virginia. Its wealth is stated at $40,000,000,000 by Senator MORRILL.

To put this matter in another form let me state the amount of circulating medium per capita of the population of England, France, Germany, and then of our own country. First, England has twenty-three dollars, France has thirty-three dollars, and slow Germany has nineteen dollars; while our own country has twenty dollars. So, as compared with other countries, we are not so fearfully inflated after all.

Specie payments are desirable, it is true, but they have their evil as well as good consequences. The financial disaster of 1837 was the severest of our times, and those of 1847 and of 1857 were far more destructive than that of 1873; yet only on this last occasion had we an exclusive paper currency. When evil times came, all lacked confidence in paper money issued on a specie basis. Everybody was afraid of it, and sold it for what they could get. Not so with paper money in 1873. All had perfect confidence in it, and many made great sacrifices to get it; it was money that was wanted in the crisis of 1873, not specie. Why this opposite conduct; a conduct absolutely universal?

We adopted a new system of currency about ten years since. If it was too large for us, if the notes it authorized were irredeemable in gold or silver, if it was inconsistent with that of other countries and at war with the most beautiful theories of our proudest writers and orators, it has allowed us to expand the villages of Chicago and of Saint Louis into mighty cities, and to earn one-half as much wealth in ten years as England has earned since it was invaded by Julius Cæsar some two thousand years ago.

All the wealth of France, both real and personal, accumulated during so many ages of industry, amounts only to $40,000,000,000, as I have already stated. Yet strange to say this country, with the paper money which it has recently become so fashionable to denounce, in ten short years has acquired $20,000,000,000, or an amount half as large as that of all France. While year by year achieving results so utterly without parallel in the world's history the people have been besought with wondrous and audacious importunity to change the system thus gloriously bearing them onward to such success.

Of course the theoretical intermeddlers did not succeed in their efforts to change the brilliantly successful system. The people have resisted these efforts patiently ten years; and the amusing part is that the theorists are ever so intently eyeing their violated theories that they have not yet discovered the wonderful growth everywhere visible around them. They cannot appreciate the facts that the mere wages of factory operatives amount to a larger sum than the entire circulating medium used by this country for all purposes, and that engaged in other occupations there are six times as many more persons who earn wages. The mere earnings of American factories exceeded four years ago the sum of $4,000,000,000 per annum. Of the stupendous amounts of business going on in this wide country of ours the would-be doctors of our currency seem to have a very feeble conception.

For one, I believe the people right in their steadfast opposition to all contraction of their present currency and in their opposition to all increase of the currency, the necessity for which cannot first be clearly shown. All violent efforts to resume specie payments are necessarily injudicious. Plans to resume when masked under a pretense of a desire to render our paper more safe are simply slanderous. Everybody in our country believes in the perfect safety of our greenbacks and national-bank notes. They need no legislative strengthening plaster. Let resumption come easy, and without anxious solicitation; no wry faces, no convulsive shrugs of the shoulders. It will be along one of these days if we are simply industrious and economical as a people; otherwise it will come later.

In the mean time there are palpable errors that we ought to hasten to correct.

The West, South, and the Middle States need more local capital and more currency. It is wrong to say, when we notice such a glut of money as we do now in New York, and such a dearth all over the Western and Southern country as is observable to every one, that no more is needed in those regions of dearth or it would go there. The proposition may be true enough in the language of the theories so much in vogue, but it is false in fact and false in practice. The West and South and Middle States need more organized and active capital if they would develop and profitably conduct their industries and trade. To allow of this organization it is proposed to deprive other States of a portion of their privileges, and confer them upon the destitute.

This deprivation plan may be a wise one in theory, but to practical men it seems weak and unwise, to say the least. Let those who have capital in the Eastern States use it as profitably as they have heretofore done; do not take it from them. Why do them an injury? On the other hand, relax the law and allow the destitute cities of the West and South to organize and use all the capital they need. Give them the free-banking law they ask Congress for, but with the same regulations as are required by the present law. Why not? Who is injured by building up industry and trade in remote cities and villages? Who is profited by their destitution?

Now in this law I propose, as far as my vote goes, to give the West, and South, and North—in fact the whole country—more currency, if it needs it, by the means of free banking, regulated as I have said before by the provisions already existing in the national banking act. There could be nothing simpler than our banking system. The Government is in debt some $3,000,000,000, for which it has issued bonds bearing interest and running from five to forty years; the parties holding these bonds, wishing to use them in business, are permitted to deposit them with the Treasurer of the United States, he issues nine-tenths of their amount in small bills, insuring their ultimate redemption by holding the bonds as collateral security to the Government. If a man has $100,000 in bonds, he can get on them $90,000 in small national-bank notes; with them he goes to banking; if he loses his money, the Government pays the notes and keeps the bonds.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to extend this system to anybody having the bonds, and there seems no reason why it should not be. It permits the increase of the circulating medium, it is true, but it is properly secured as formerly. The only question is, can the Government stand sponsor for more money? If the answer be yes, as it must be, what harm? And, on the other hand, what a wonderful amount of good it will do. The merchants, manufacturers, miners, and farmers of remote States need banking facilities as really as do similar persons in the Eastern States. One hundred million dollars of bank capital located in the thriving villages and cities west of the Hudson River and used there would be of incalculable value to our whole country.

Let us see if the importance and propriety of this last proposition cannot be made manifest. In the country west of the Alleghanies the mines are numerous and rich, and are so accessible to consumers of their products, that, although but partially opened and worked, they have marvelously augmented the wealth of the nation. A like result has flowed from their swiftly improving agriculture and from their increasing trade and commerce. To show what use they have for banks, look at the increase of the value of goods manufactured in a few of these far-off States.

In 1850 these States west of the Alleghanies manufactured goods amounting to a little over $200,000,000. But as there were manufactured that year in the United States goods valued at the large sum of $1,000,000,000, the manufacturers of the West and South were lightly esteemed. Twenty years have rolled away, and the census now shows that these remote States manufactured more goods in one year by $250,000,000 than all the States, themselves included, had manufactured in 1850. Yet the value of the manufactures of these remote States is small compared with the value of their trade, commerce, and transportation, or compared with the value of their agricultural and planting products.

To enable them to transact their business satisfactorily to themselves and their customers the Finance Committee of the Senate gravely propose to grant them twenty-five millions of bank capital, and have reported a bill accordingly—a sum inadequate to run their steamboats and railroad trains; a sum inadequate to make one payment of wages to their factory operatives. Give them free banking; then they may so dispose of their bonds as to always have enough currency to transact their legitimate business. We have had of various sorts, including the compound-interest notes, 3 per cent. certificates of indebtedness, &c., an outstanding circulation of more than $1,000,000,000. We have, after doubling the wealth and business of the country, reduced our circulation to a sum below $750,000,000—more than 25 per cent. Do you wonder there is a stringency in the money market?

If with half the wealth, with half the business, the country was greatly benefited by the use of 25 per cent. more circulation than we now have, what excuse can we offer for refusing to allow a reasonable amount of banking facilities to this wonderfully prosperous people East as well as West and South? By unnatural processes a huge inflation of the currency has been inflicted upon one of our great cities.

Instead of promptly applying a correction, shall we give their existence as a reason why we should refuse banking facilities to many millions of men? Without increasing the circulating medium to an amount as large as it was formerly, Congress can grant all that has been asked for, namely, sufficient to transact business, and that, too, without seriously disturbing a system which has wrought out results of greater magnitude and beneficence than any other yet tried in a large country of such diversified industries.

Mr. Speaker, this bill before the House is undoubtedly the result of mature deliberation on the part of the Committee on Banking and Currency, aided by the wisdom of the many bankers and other business men who have from time to time appeared before them to express their views on the subject.

Now, sir, I am in favor of the second section of this bill, which removes the restrictions upon the amount of the circulation, which in fact makes banking free, and yet I really do not feel as if I could answer to the name of inflationist; because, while I favor free banking, I desire that all the present regulations, restrictions, and securities by reserves, be continued in their full force; and because I think and say here that I believe this House will do well to leave those regulations in force, and will do much harm should they remove them.

The distinguished gentleman on the committee from Illinois thinks we should not supervise banking, unless it is proposed to supervise every other kind of business, and cites one case as in point, "the First National Bank of this city, located in the very shadow of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, to prove the absolute worthlessness of this governmental care and supervision over our banking institutions."

If the officers of this bank violated their oaths in making a sworn statement of the loans, discounts, and legal-tenders on hand which they are called upon to make at least five times a year, and at such times as suits the Comptroller, does the committee bring forward this isolated case of bank dishonesty as a reason for relaxing or removing the present governmental supervision?

The same gentleman says that "when Congress has passed such currency laws as will secure the bill-holder its duty is done." I beg to differ with the gentleman on this point. If this bill becomes a law, and banking is free to all in State or Territory, I hold that it is tenfold more important that Congress should increase the reserves and restrictions so as to make depositors as well as bill-holders secure, so that the people will still retain that unbounded confidence they now have in the Government to keep the control of the banking interests of this country. This confidence is caused by the knowledge that the Government controls, and this is manifested by the stamp of "nationality" on each bill, and after an institution has complied with all the requirements of the law in organizing a bank it places above the entrance to its banking-house "national" which gives it standing at once, and gives the people confidence in the institution.

Mr. Speaker, I give notice here that I will introduce an amendment striking out every section of this bill excepting the second section, reducing the bill to a plain and simple bill permitting free banking, and retaining all the provisions of the old law governing the principle of banking.

The distinguished gentleman from the committee also recommends that the present usury law be abolished.

Before I close my remarks I wish to enter my protest before this House against abolishing the usury law. Gentlemen say the law is useless because it is disregarded; but I tell you, gentlemen, the law is not disregarded to so great an extent as is generally supposed. The letter of the law is maintained, though often the spirit is disregarded, which shows that it has some force still, and even then the law is disregarded by those only who know their man.

Mr. Speaker, if this law were abolished, the necessitous borrower in the money market would be aptly illustrated to my mind by a dwelling on fire in a village. The lower portion of the house wrapped in flames, the occupants go to the upper story, and make frantic appeals for help. They cannot be reached except by the aid of an extra long ladder; there is only one such in the village. The neighbors rush off for that, but are repulsed by a demand for $100 for the use of it. The neighbors begin to expostulate that it is too much. The owner of the ladder knows full well they must pay his price or the family will be burned. It is a case of life or death, and the money must be paid to save them. Just so is it with the money-lender, banks, and other loan institutions, (true, there are exceptions;) they know their victim must have the money he asks for that day or fail. Do away with the usury law, and it will unsettle the present reasonable rate of interest throughout the country.

Mr. WALDRON. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the variety of plans, theories, and devices which have been presented to this body as furnishing a solution for what has been termed "the financial problem." A man must be indeed fastidious who cannot find something in the numerous projects of the hour which tallies with his preferences and judgment. I only desire to announce the convictions which will govern my vote on the different schemes that have been brought before this Congress.

In the first place, I regard the issuing of a paper currency by the Government as at least a doubtful exercise of power, and certainly most pernicious in its influence on the business interests of the people. We have acquiesced in its exercise when the salvation of the nation seemed to require it, but the necessity has passed away, and the paper which was the creature of the necessity should now gradually be retired. So long as the policy of issuing irredeemable paper is persisted in, so long shall we have instability, uncertainty, fluctuations, and panics. Constant pressure will be brought upon Congress to increase or contract the volume of the currency. The business of the country will be, as it is to-day, paralyzed because of the uncertainty of our legislation. Men refrain from embarking in business enterprises because values as measured by an irredeemable currency are continually rising or falling as the volume of paper increases or diminishes. So long as the power is exercised by the Government, or any Department thereof, to issue inconvertible paper, just so long is an element of uncertainty added to the operations of the business world, which fosters speculation, stimulates gambling, and cripples legitimate trade.

Look at the spectacle of to-day. No man can tell within $44,000,000 what the limit of our legal-tender currency is, or is to be. No man can tell whether our steps are to be in the direction of resumption of specie payment, or in the opposite direction of expansion. Now, what the country wants is stability, permanence, persistence in some fixed policy. When our policy is announced, the business of the country will adjust itself to it; but so long as we disregard the world's standard of value, and leave the amount of our currency to the changing legislation of Congress, or the discretion of a Department, we are at sea without pilot or chart.

Another objection that I have to our irredeemable currency is that its continuance is debauching and corrupting the moral sense of the nation. We are actually farther from resumption to-day than we were at the close of the war. Men begin to argue that gold and silver are not the best representatives of value, and overlooking the fact that industry is the source of wealth, they would substitute a printing-press to manufacture currency.

The issue of irredeemable promises to pay adds nothing to the wealth or prosperity of a people; but there is this pernicious peculiarity attending it, that every issue only creates the demand for additional issues; the first step yielded, the others readily follow. The history of the civilized world is full of instruction and warning to us, to which it were madness to shut our eyes; and as to its influence on the industries of a nation, we have the testimony of the great Massachusetts statesman, Daniel Webster, many years ago. He said:

> A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system, and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy; and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation. Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper currency. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by a depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression on the virtuous and well disposed of a degraded paper currency authorized by law or in any way countenanced by Government.

Believing that the legal-tender currency is the obstacle to the resumption of specie payments, I am in favor of its retirement, and the substitution in its place of the national-bank currency. I would divorce the Government from the banking business, leaving to it the supervision of banking corporations so as to insure protection to the bill-holder, and making the business of banking free to all persons or corporations who will comply with the requirements of law. The present banking law is the best which the ingenuity of man has devised. Its value has been tested by years of experience, and more especially by the panic of last autumn. While that revulsion struck down merchants, manufacturers, and business interests of all kinds, the national banks of the country went safely through. Out of twenty-one hundred banks organized under the law, but eleven have failed in eleven years; and even in their case no bill-holder has lost a dollar. Such an exhibit is without a parallel in any business experience.

Now, the only objection that can be urged to this system is that it is limited by law. It is alleged that it is a monopoly, and from that objection I would relieve it by throwing it open to any and all who desire to invest their capital in banking. And, as a preliminary to throwing it open, a policy should be adopted which looks to the retirement of the legal-tender notes.

As for the different modes suggested for the redemption of the greenbacks I am wedded to no particular plan, although I prefer the passage of a law which shall provide that one-fourth of the customs duties may be paid in greenbacks and the notes destroyed. Since the close of the war the Government has used its surplus gold to pay its bonded debt before it was due—let it now use it to retire a demand debt long past due. This policy would at once appreciate the greenback in value and would retire forty millions a year, the other three-fourths of the customs duties being payable in coin and furnishing the gold to pay the interest on the public debt. It may be urged that this would be too slow a redemption of the legal-tender currency, but it should be slow, it should be gradual, there should be no sudden and violent contraction of the currency; no unnecessary derangement of the business of the people; but let the policy be fixed; let it be steady and permanent; let it be, above all, in the right direction, holding every inch that we gain, and although we should cancel but one-tenth of the greenbacks in a year, yet the influence would be felt at once in their steady approach to a gold standard of value.

Long before the time has elapsed which would be necessary to absorb this paper, it would be at par with gold. The withdrawal of a fraction of it through the custom-houses, coupled with the demand for it on the part of new national banks as a reserve, would soon so circumscribe the amount in circulation that it would be within the means of the Government to redeem it in gold long before the time was reached for its entire withdrawal.

And while this retirement of greenbacks is going on a free banking system will supply to the country currency just as the needs of business and wants of trade demand, and it is much better to leave that matter to the laws of trade than to any arbitrary action of Congress or Departments.

On motion of Mr. WALDRON, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 30, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received and been requested to present a memorial, very numerously signed, alleging that the navigating interests of the Eastern States are oppressed by onerous and as they believe, illegal demands by way of pilotage through Hell Gate, New York. They ask Congress to adopt such measures as will relieve them from the effects of unconstitutional acts passed by State Legislatures for the prohibition of commerce. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Sarah E. Ballantine, widow of David Ballantine, sr., of Boonville, Missouri, praying compensation for damages sustained to her property during the late war by order of General Lyon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of Charles W. Smith, Edward R. Rhodes, and others, of Providence, Rhode Island, protesting against the extension of patents by acts of Congress, representing that it is of great injury to the manufacturers and consumers of patented articles, and that more injustice is done in this country by such acts than by those of like nature in foreign countries. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a memorial of J. C. Wilson and 119 other citizens of Rochester, Michigan, urging immediate action on the financial question, and praying that the volume of the legal-tenders be fixed at $400,000,000, and for the passage of a free-banking law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KELLY presented affidavits of R. S. Crystal, John C. Allen, and Charles Lafollet, relating to charges against Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the memorial of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector of the United States Navy, praying that his name be placed upon the prize-list with those entitled to share in the prize-money awarded to the fleet of Admiral Farragut for the capture and destruction of rebel vessels resulting in the capture of New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT presented five memorials of citizens of Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the imposition of a tariff duty on tea and coffee, in opposition to any increase of internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1874, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on certain foreign imports; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

CUSTOMS FINES, PENALTIES, AND FORFEITURES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to Senate resolution of December 9, 1873, a statement of the amount paid collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and detectives, engaged in the customs service, on account of distributive shares of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for the ten years ending June 30, 1873, have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. This is the document, [pointing to a large document upon the desk.] It contains a great deal of information which I suppose if it ought to have been furnished, ought to be printed, as it is of no use in its present shape; but it seems to the Committee on Printing that the recapitulated results, which are embodied in small space, would answer all the purposes of the inquiry. But it is a matter which relates to financial administration, and the committee desire that the Senate should have the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to state, Mr. President, with your permission, that while I do not know but that this document furnishes desirable information, it shows the great bulk of some of the answers to resolutions of inquiry we send to the Executive Departments. It will cost over $6,000 to print this document in full. Of the expediency of that cost the Committee on Appropriations can judge better than the Committee on Printing. Some time ago, when I had the honor to be a member of the Committee on Rules, we reported a rule that all resolutions of inquiry should go first to the proper standing committee, to ascertain if the object to be attained was worth the cost of obtaining it; but it did not meet with the approbation of the Senate, which thought that it was a restriction upon the right of inquiry.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask, by whom was this information called for?

Mr. ANTHONY. By the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS. By what member of the Senate?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know. It is not stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the original resolution was offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. DAVIS. I understand it is moved to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the report of the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has been made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2543) in relation to mineral lands, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 26) in relation to mineral lands, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the bill may go on the Calendar.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say to the Senator that the precise bill which the House has passed is his bill, and that the committee have reported upon it favorably, with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1950) granting a pension to Betsie Lewis, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles McCarty, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1943) granting a pension to Helen M. Stansbury, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 496) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the orders of Major-General Carlos Buell, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of certain settlers upon homestead and pre-emption lands, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of March 3 to report upon the expediency of furnishing to each member of the Senate a copy of "Practical Information concerning the Public Debt of the United States, with the National Banking Laws," published by W. H. & O. H. Morrison, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

TWO PER CENT. FUND.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of the governors of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in regard to what is commonly known as the 2 per cent. fund, which they claim to be due them from the General Government, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report back the memorial with a written report, which we desire to have printed, and to present with it a bill. The committee recommend the passage of the bill, in the hope that justice may finally be done to these three States.

The bill (S. No. 637) to settle certain accounts between the United States and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reference to that report I have a word to say. That subject was referred to the Judiciary Committee at the last session, as the Chair remembers; was very carefully considered, was debated in the Senate for days, a vote taken upon it, and finally disposed of. It seems to me that that matter should not be referred or a report come from another committee now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to commit it to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to commit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURMAN. What committee reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. THURMAN. It has not been very customary, I think, in the Senate when a committee has made a report to send that report to another committee for revision. I have tried several times, when a question of law was involved, to have a bill reported by a committee sent to the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the mere question of law, but never have succeeded yet, and have been sometimes pretty sharply rebuked for attempting to do it, it seeming to be thought to be a reflection upon the committee that had reported the bill.

Now, sir, I see no reason in this case to depart from the usage of the Senate. Here, as I understand—this is the first time I have heard of it; I did not know this matter was before us this session at all—this subject has been before a committee and that committee has reported. How it has reported I do not know; but suppose the matter was before the Judiciary Committee at the last session, and the majority of that committee reported adversely to the claim; and now suppose there is a report in favor of the claim by another committee; that is no reason for sending the report of that committee to the Judiciary Committee for revision. Both reports will be before the Senate, and the Senate can decide which of the two committees has arrived at the proper conclusion. I hope there will be no reference of this to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is very clear that this matter must have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands by an inadvertence, for it seems that the Senator from Ohio did not know that it was before the Senate, and I am sure I did not know that it was before the Senate, and the Senator from Ohio and myself were a subcommittee that examined this subject at the last session of the Senate. It is purely a question of law. It has nothing to do with the public lands at all. It might as well have been referred to the Committee on Education as to the Committee on Public Lands. It is a naked question of law which has been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, discussed in the Senate for days, and finally adjudicated upon by the Senate. It is no reflection upon the Committee on Public Lands, if it was improperly referred to them, to have it referred where, according to the rules of the Senate, the subject properly belongs.

Mr. THURMAN. I must beg leave to say that there is something more in this than a bare, naked question of law. There is a question whether this claim has not a broad equity that appeals to the justice of the Government, whatever may be the strict technical law upon the subject.

Now, in respect to this claim, we have had divers reports upon it. We had an elaborate report in the House of Representatives from the Committee on the Judiciary of that body—I think it was the Judiciary Committee; I feel that I cannot be mistaken about that—in favor of this claim. We had a report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate adverse to the claim. And now if we have the report of another committee upon the same subject, I do not see that that lays the slightest foundation for sending that report to the Committee on the Judiciary, as if the Committee on the Judiciary was to sit as a court of errors upon the reports of other committees of this body. I think that is contrary to the usage of the Senate. I have given my own experience on bills involving constitutional questions of the gravest moment. I recollect one instance perfectly well. I asked that the bill might be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary to report on that constitutional question, and I was told by the oldest Senator in the body, the late Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Sumner,) that that was contrary to the usage of the Senate, and would be considered a reflection upon the committee that reported the bill. When I say I was told so, the Senate was told so, for he spoke it openly in his place, and the motion failed. I have never known such a motion to succeed unless the committee that reported the bill itself acquiesced in the proposed reference.

I therefore insist in this case that there is no necessity to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. We know what the majority of the Judiciary Committee think about it. The committee is substantially constituted now as it was when it made its report. A majority of the committee are opposed to this measure, opposed to the claim, do not believe it has any validity; and sending it back to that committee is simply to bury it. Now, as the Senate, and not the committee, is to decide this question, there is no necessity for sending the bill to that committee to review the report that has been made by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONKLING. If this report is one contemplated by the rules of the Senate in their spirit, certainly our rules and proceedings are odd and lame. Here is a matter involving a great sum of money, and involving a mere question of law, nothing else, for if there be equity in it, the equity grows out of a question of law. Some time ago petitions and a bill being introduced, the subject was referred to the Judiciary Committee. An elaborate examination was made by the committee, and an adverse report in writing was made to the Senate. A discussion, or rather a number of discussions, ensued here, and the action of the Senate sustained the committee and was adverse to the bill.

Had a bill been introduced afterward, and by inadvertence or otherwise referred to the Committee on Public Lands, what I must conceive as the very novel result before us, would be less unusual. But what do we find? Upon looking at the papers sent to the Secretary's desk, nothing will be found but a report of the committee and a bill originated by the committee. Does not all this seem odd? A question of law, an important question of law, is referred to the law committee of the body, patiently and fully considered, passed upon, and final action taken deliberately by the Senate; and thereupon another committee of the Senate, to which I think nobody would say it would properly have belonged originally, without any reference of a bill to the committee, of its own mere motion, originates a bill—and no doubt, by general parliamentary law, every committee has a right to do this—and brings it forward, thus entirely discarding, superseding, and ignoring the action of the Senate already taken in the case.

Mr. President, if there was any use in referring this subject to the Judiciary Committee, the Senate obtained the benefit of that reference. The report is here, the bill is here upon the files of the Senate. It was defeated by a vote of the Senate. If anybody wants it referred to the committee to be examined again, I am not prepared to say that that would be very extraordinary; but I submit to the Senate that it is a plain violation, if not of the letter of the rules and of the parliamentary law, of the spirit of those rules and of that law, when one committee has been charged with a subject, has examined it carefully, has made an elaborate report, and the Senate has taken jurisdiction of the whole thing, discussed it, and pronounced upon it, for another committee, without a bill being referred to it—the Senator from Ohio says he did not even know that the subject was before any committee of the body—of its own motion to originate a bill and bring it in just as if there had never been any proceeding on the subject before.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for one moment to make a statement?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood him to say that the Committee on Public Lands had nothing referred to it.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say so. I said the Committee on Public Lands had no bill referred to it, and that the papers sent to the table of the Secretary by that committee consist of a report and a bill in manuscript originated by the committee, and of nothing else.

Mr. THURMAN. But they had a memorial referred to them.

Mr. CONKLING. That may be; I said nothing on that subject. I say now, however, if that committee did have another memorial referred to them, I should like to know upon whose motion the memorial was referred, and I will hazard the judgment that had attention been called to it at the time, that memorial would never have been referred to a new committee not appropriately chargeable with the subject, when it had already been given to the Judiciary Committee, and that committee had elaborately investigated it. Where should we be if that were the rule? I introduce a memorial on a particular subject, and it is referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims examines it elaborately, comes in with a written report; a bill is reported; it is discussed in the Senate, and acted upon finally; and thereupon I introduce another memorial on the same subject, and I select some other committee, and have it referred to that committee, and try my hand there, and that committee by and by reports back something, and that is adverse. Then I introduce another memorial, and have it referred to a third committee. Where is it to stop? And is it in accordance either with the usages of parliamentary bodies, or with sound sense, to do any such thing? Think of such experimental practice courts. The Legislature provides that when one judge even at chambers has refused an order, it shall be unlawful to apply to another judge for it again. Why? For the very reason which prevails here. The presumption is, when a memorial or a subject is brought before the Senate, that the Senate acts not mistakenly, but correctly, in selecting the committee to which it properly belongs. Therefore the presumption would be, without referring to the nature of this question, that the Senate acted intelligently and reasonably in directing the Judiciary Committee to investigate this subject. Moreover, we see that the nature of the question is one which pertained to that committee; and now because there is an adverse report, some petitioner who is not satisfied with that, or with the adverse action of the Senate, sends to some other Senator—we have not yet heard who—a memorial, and that Senator by accident or design selects some other committee, and that committee originates a bill of its own, looking in the other direction, and we are invited to again traverse this ground upon that.

Mr. President, I do not feel the interest in this 2 per cent. matter which evidently inspires some other members of the Senate, and naturally enough; it does not specially affect any locality which may look to me to represent it. I have, however, a very clear judgment about the 2 per cent. bill, and a very clear judgment about the propriety of taking the large sum of money involved from the Treasury, and giving it to anybody. But I make no note of the merits of the question one way or the other at this time.

I insist upon it if we are to have the safeguards, and they are few enough, which prevail in parliamentary bodies and to derive any benefit from our rules, that we should in all cases so enforce them that when the appropriate committee has been selected and the subject given to it and the committee has investigated and reported, and the Senate has acted, some other committee without notice to anybody shall not start up, even though a petition be referred to it, and review the whole matter, reverse the former decision, and bring the Senate to action upon it again.

Therefore I shall vote to recommit this bill, objecting as I do to its being read a second time to-day, to the Committee on the Judiciary unless there is objection to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects to the second reading of the bill, and it will be laid aside.

Mr. OGLESBY. What do I understand by laying the bill aside?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the Calendar, but the motion to refer will be laid aside because it cannot be entertained until the second reading of the bill. The bill cannot be read the second time to-day, objection being made.

Mr. OGLESBY. There are explanations that ought to be made here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are out of order now.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to say that I wish to present a minority report from the Committee on Public Lands. That was the understanding of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule of the Senate is that there can be no minority report; but, what is practically the same thing, members dissenting to the report may present their views, which are always received by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I will withdraw my objection to enable any Senator to be heard who wishes to be heard. I did not make it for that purpose, but because I shall object when the time comes, and do now if this be the proper time, to the second reading of the bill. But if my friend from Illinois wishes to make any statement I withdraw the objection for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the proper time to make the objection, and having been made the bill cannot be read the second time to-day.

Mr. OGLESBY. Do I understand that the Senator from New York has withdrawn his objection?

Mr. CONKLING. I will, with the permission of the Chair, withdraw it to enable the Senator to say anything particularly of a personal character which he wishes to say; but I cannot consent that the bill be read the second time to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that this debate has so far proceeded by general consent. If there be no objection it can proceed farther.

Mr. MORTON. A single objection——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor on this question, if anybody. Is there objection to the further discussion of this subject by the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none.

Mr. OGLESBY. There is a misapprehension in the start about how the bill now before the Senate originated. A memorial, printed, and signed by the governors of three different States of the Union, with a joint resolution, was handed to the Senator who presented the memorial, was brought in in open session in the morning hour, and presented here for reference to the Committee on Public Lands. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] had the impression in his mind, and so stated to the committee, that the joint resolution had been presented with the memorial and referred with it. When, however, we got into the committee and called the subject up, the Senator from Indiana then for the first time read the resolution and said that he believed he had not sent it with the memorial. The joint resolution that went with the memorial is the bill now presented, and it is changed from a joint resolution to a bill, a very short one, giving interpretation to acts passed by Congress in years gone by and making other statements.

The question of this 2 per cent. fund is not exclusively a matter of law. There are matters of fact connected with it; and the whole case sprang out of the public lands. In the admission of these States into the Union it was exclusively a question pertaining and referring to the public lands. It was in connection with the question of public lands and in regard to their proceeds being used in making the Cumberland road that the claim arose. Hence it was altogether proper that this memorial and joint resolution, which was not formally referred, and which now comes back in the shape of a bill simply changed by the committee from a joint resolution to a bill, should have been before the Committee on Public Lands just as well as before the Committee on the Judiciary.

It is said there was a report from the Judiciary Committee against this bill. That was not in this Congress; it was in another Congress. Shall I state to the Senate that this matter has been before other Congresses than this, and that it has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives, reported on favorably and passed by overwhelming majorities, and that after it was reported against in this body at the last session of Congress, although the Committee on the Judiciary reported against the bill, it came within one or two votes of passing? I wish to know if there has anything thus far been done in connection with the bill now presented to this Congress that presents any unusual aspect or that shrouds the bill in mystery or covers it with suspicion? It is a frank appeal to Congress by three States of the Union for what they consider a matter of justice under law and under facts and under compacts; and the Committee on Public Lands as well as the friends of the measure perfectly well know that it cannot pass this body without free, open, and ample debate. We did not know but that in the progress of the debate, as the Calendar should be read and disposed of, a question might be hereafter raised as to whether the bill should be referred to the Judiciary or some other committee; but it was wholly unexpected that a movement would be made this morning to cut off the deliberations of the Committee on Public Lands, to cut off their report, to throw away all they have done and throw it into a new channel, raising a cloud of suspicion upon it, without a word of explanation.

There are able lawyers upon the Committee on Public Lands, and one of the ablest lawyers on that committee, I doubt not, when he makes the minority report which the Committee on Public Lands have given him permission to do, will show as much as any other ordinary lawyer could show on his side of the question; and that minority report will go with the majority report, although it may be signed by the names of but few members of the committee. I did not expect the question would be raised this morning of referring the matter to a new committee. I hope the Senate will keep the bill before it on the report of the Committee on Public Lands, until it shall be discussed and its merits understood, and it be seen whether this is a just claim or unjust claim. If it be an unjust claim and one that ought not to be voted to these States, they will each of them scorn to receive it; but as long as they shall conscientiously believe it is a just claim they will stand here, modestly but earnestly, claiming the right to the money.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this is not a new measure before the Senate, and I do not know of any peculiar lien, either equitable or legal, that the Judiciary Committee have to administer upon this bill. They have made a report, which is now on the files for reference, and I doubt whether they could add anything to it. They are substantially the same committee now that made that report. This memorial from the governors of the States concerned was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I think very properly. It is a claim growing out of a donation of the public lands heretofore, and to it belongs the consideration of the public-land laws. Why, Mr. President, if every question that involves some matter of law or equity is to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, it would draw more than half the business of this body to it. There are questions that properly belong to that committee, and there are other questions that properly belong to other committees although they do involve some questions of law or of equity. There may be questions of equity where there is technically no legal right. We have courts of equity to administer upon such cases; and it is peculiarly the jurisdiction of Congress to administer and to do equity even where there may be no claim of law.

I think in every point of view that this memorial went very properly to the Committee on Public Lands, and I think it would be treating that committee with some disrespect now to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, thereby assuming that the Committee on Public Lands cannot understand whatever law there may be arising out of the facts involved in this claim. I have no doubt they are able to comprehend the law and to comprehend the equity, and I presume from the character of the committee they have paid more attention to the laws governing public lands than even the Committee on the Judiciary. Therefore for one I shall object to the recommitment of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SARGENT. The amount involved in this bill is about one and one-third million dollars. During a long series of years the Government of the United States endeavored to extinguish this claim and for that purpose spent $3,821,248; and as these appropriations were made in different amounts, amounting in all to the aggregate which I have mentioned, by careful legislation spread over the statute-books during Congress after Congress, it was provided that the amount appropriated should be applied to the extinguishment of this claim on the part of these three States. Now, sir, if it is a question to be decided by this Congress whether there is law or equity requiring the Government of the United States, after expending this immense sum to extinguish this demand, to pay a further sum, I must say that for one member of this body I want the opinion of the highest legal authority in this body.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to see one act of Congress that purported to be an extinguishment of these claims.

Mr. SARGENT. By the original legislation.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that he is arguing the merits of the case.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well. If the Senator objects to my answering the question, I will not answer it. I was simply showing the importance of the proposition before the body, and that Congress heretofore had endeavored to dispose of it, and dispose of it not only equitably to these States, but in a spirit of lavish generosity. Now, sir, if there is, as is contended, an equity in this matter, then I want the Judiciary Committee to define the exact limits of that equity, or, if it arises out of strict law, let us know what the laws are and what the inference to be derived from them is. Therefore I think, instead of this coming from a committee, when we have referred to them no bill for that purpose, from a committee whose duty it is simply to pass upon the policy relating to public lands, it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, which we trust with matters of pure legal cognizance. I must say that I have confidence that that committee will give us a report which will show whether we are liable or not.

I believe not merely in being generous to these three States, but I believe in being just to the people at large. And certainly our Treasury is not now in a condition to deplete it of the enormous sum which this legislation contemplates. For that reason there ought to be more consideration of this matter; and for that reason, furthermore, we ought to know exactly what our legal obligations are.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot permit the remark of the Senator from California, that Congress has again and again passed acts in extinguishment of this claim, to go without notice. I think I have investigated this claim about as carefully as any Senator on this floor, and this is the first time I have heard it suggested that Congress had given anything or appropriated anything in extinguishment of it. There is certainly no such thing said in the elaborate report of the Judiciary Committee made by the Senator from New Jersey in last Congress, upon which he bestowed so much care and pains. Never before have I heard any such suggestion. If the Senator wishes to go into the question of what States have received the most public lands, what States have been dealt with most generously, I am perfectly ready to go with him into that investigation, and to show that of all the new States this side of the Rocky Mountains these very three States have received the most niggardly treatment.

Mr. SARGENT. The question which the Senator raises of course is entirely foreign to the discussion. How far the State of Ohio may have been benefited by this legislation in particular, probably he can judge, when, under the legislation of Congress and to extinguish this grant, there was built through the whole State of Ohio a highway as magnificent as that of the Cæsars, and now, under a perhaps better claim of Illinois, and perhaps a still better of Indiana, if there is any value in any of these claims, the State of Ohio comes in, and under the protecting wing of those States would pretend that the money which we spent in building that great public road through the State of Ohio shall not be chargeable to this 2 per cent. which the United States retained for the purpose of building the highway to and through these States. Certainly the Senator's State is the last one to complain either of this legislation or the effect which has been produced by the six or seven millions which the Congress of the United States authorized to be expended to carry out its original contract with those States.

But, sir, I do not care to go into that question. I merely intended to advert to it in passing to show the magnitude of the question involved, how heavily it bears upon the Treasury of the United States; and if there be any legal defense which the Government of the United States has from paying this claim, then I want it to be set forth by the legal organ of this body. Sir, we are not here in the position simply of representing the States which sent us here; we are not here merely to further the draft of vast sums of money from the Treasury for the benefit of our respective localities; but we are here to protect the Treasury of the United States, whether we are here from California, from Maine, or from Ohio. We are here to see that the best that can be said on behalf of the Government of the United States is said, and said by the proper committee, and said by Congress itself; and for that reason I think this, a purely legal question, should go to the Judiciary Committee. When that committee shall report upon it, and give us the legal aspects of the matter, then I shall be prepared, I trust, to discuss the value of their conclusions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There is a little more morning business to present, and I therefore must object to the further consumption of time on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order. Reports of committees are still in order. This bill having been read the first time will be printed with the report, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask whether the motion which I made, to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee, will come up with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will.

MRS. CYNTHIA M'PHERSON.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson, instruct me to report it back without amendment. This bill has been laid over on account of my sickness, and I will therefore ask for its immediate consideration. It passed the House unanimously, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of James B. McPherson, late major-general in the United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. TIPTON. Has that bill been reported from the Committee on Pensions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has. The Senator from South Carolina states that it has laid over in his hands owing to his sickness, and he therefore asks its consideration at this time.

Mr. TIPTON. I discover it to be one of those special bills to meet a special case for a special purpose, which I never did think was in accordance with the equities and justice of our pension system, and therefore I was not aware that it had been to the committee or supposed it would not come up in this shape from the committee; but I shall not object this morning against the will of the Senate.

The bill was passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 638) for the relief of Joseph Dunlap, a settler on the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAGER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 639) authorizing military bounty-land warrants to be received in payment of lands in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FENTON. For several years past there has been a controversy in Congress and out of it relating to the claims of New York Indians to lands in Kansas. A gentleman who I think is familiar with the subject has drawn a bill which I am asked to introduce. I have not examined it with that care which I ought to give it, before committing myself to its provisions, but I ask leave to introduce it.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 640) to provide a settlement with the Six Nations of New York Indians of questions growing out of unexecuted treaty stipulations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 641) for the relief of Daniel Stickney, postmaster at Presque Isle, Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 642) to revive and continue in force section 7 of an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the Territory of Minnesota in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territory; and granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in said State," approved March 3, 1857, and to extend the time in which said road in the State of Alabama shall be constructed for the period of five years from the date of the approval of this act; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 643) to incorporate the Washington Canal and Water-power Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. FENTON. In Senate report No. 203, to accompany Senate bill No. 552, to refund to E. & J. Koch certain customs duties, which has just been laid on the desks of Senators, I see there are several errors. The report was drawn by me under the authority of the Finance Committee. I ask that it may be returned to the Public Printer that the errors in it may be corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that report No. 203, from the Committee on Finance, be reprinted.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1600) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the English-built brig Hattie Eaton;

A bill (H. R. No. 1691) for the relief of Thomas Ridgway;

A bill (H. R. No. 2416) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the States of Oregon and California in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1872 and 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2692) to change the name of the schooner-yacht Quarantine to Welcome;

A bill (H. R. No. 2695) for the relief of Ely Cameron;

A bill (H. R. No. 2701) to relieve William G. Jones, of Alabama, of political disabilities; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2702) to relieve John Forsyth, of Alabama, of political disabilities.

SHELVES BETWEEN DESKS IN SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That no shelves shall be allowed to be placed between any desks in the Senate until the Senate shall take some action in relation thereto.

On Friday the Senate resolved to remove the fence round about the seats of the Senators, and to restore the desks to their original position. Unquestionably, to some Senators, the shelves that were formerly inserted between the desks were a great convenience; but they had become so numerous, that they were a positive nuisance before the late change. We have now some difficulty in threading our way through the seats, and I trust there will be no objection to the adoption of this resolution. If these shelves should become as numerous as they were prior to the former change, it will be almost impossible to make our way to the seat of any Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. THURMAN. I want to discuss it whenever it is taken up.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will not make any objection to it. I rose to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that this is a question which rather concerns individual Senators than the whole Senate. For example, suppose my friend beside me [Mr. HAMLIN] and myself choose to put a shelf here in order that we may have a place for some one of the deposits of documents which make it impossible for us now to put our feet on the floor or our knees under our desks, it concerns nobody but us. To be sure, it closes up a passage out of which I might go if I chose; but if I agree to it and my neighbor agrees to it, it certainly does not incommode the Senator from Vermont. So in respect to a shelf between his desk and that of his neighbor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But the Senator will see that in that way he may close up all the passage-ways, provided the two Senators on each side agree.

Mr. CONKLING. Not unless all the Senators agree to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And then we have not even a pet road or a public highway to escape through in any part of the Senate. I am not at all interested in this matter personally. It is a question that concerns other Senators much more than it does myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand whether the Senator from New York objected to the resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] objected. He said he desired to discuss it when it should be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that this is not a prohibition of these shelves, but merely to arrest their being put up until the Senate take some order upon the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Suppose you allow it to go to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move the reference of the resolution to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

ELLIOTT'S REPORT ON EUROPEAN LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit, for the information of the Senate, the report of Major George H. Elliott of his inspection of European light-house establishments.

SCHOOL LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BOGY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to report at an early day the townships and fractional townships in the State of Missouri which were entitled to lands for the use of schools, under the act of 20th of May, 1826; and to state the quantity each of said townships and fractional townships was entitled to under said law; and whether the lands to which said townships were thus entitled have been conveyed or patented by the United States to said State, for the purpose contemplated by the law.

RECORD OF M'KINSTRY COURT-MARTIAL.

Mr. BOGY. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate at an early day a full copy of the testimony and proceedings of the court-martial convened at Saint Louis in September, 1862, for the trial of Major J. McKinstry, quartermaster United States Army, on a charge of "neglect of duty."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that resolution had better lie over. If I remember that case, it would constitute an enormous volume, and would take a great deal of time to copy it.

Mr. BOGY. It is a matter of very great importance to the person himself, and I think there is no public objection to it. I am aware of none, and I made inquiry on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that the Secretary of War has declined and has stated that the available clerical force in his office now is not sufficient for him, in months to come, to supply the papers already called for by Congress. Under the circumstances I shall be compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects, and the resolution will lie over.

EXTENSION OF THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the present consideration of the report of the Committee on the Revision of the Rules providing for an extension of the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not a part of the regular morning business, and I shall object to it until after the financial discussion is over. Then I shall make no further objection to it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The chairman of the Committee on Finance will not understand me as desiring to interfere at all with the financial question. This question was submitted to the committee by a resolution referred to them by the Senate, and they have reported upon it. There is no disposition to interfere with the financial matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no hurry about acting upon the report now. Let it go over until after the pending order is disposed of.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I supposed that all Senators were interested in reaching the Calendar for the purpose of facilitating the business of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the better way would be to take a day to clear the Calendar than to add to the morning hour. At any rate, I hope the subject will not be taken up now.

Mr. STEWART. Would it be satisfactory to the Senator from Ohio if the resolution should be amended so as to provide that it shall not take effect until after the pending financial bill is disposed of?

Mr. SHERMAN. The extension of the morning hour will only allow the passage, perhaps, of two or three more bills each morning, and I think it would be better to name a day for the consideration of the Calendar and act upon it. However, the morning hour is over now, and I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business; but if there be no objection the Chair will receive morning business.

Several SENATORS. Let us get rid of morning business.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WADLEIGH to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections caused by the death of Mr. Sumner; and appointed Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Education and Labor arising from the same cause.

SEMINOLE ANNUITIES.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] was appointed one of the conference committee in regard to the difference between the two Houses relative to the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians. I understand that he is called home, and may not return for some days. I ask that the Chair be authorized to appoint a substitute in his place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Chair be authorized to fill a vacancy in the committee of conference, occasioned by the absence of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.] Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Mr. McCREERY to the vacancy occasioned by the absence of Mr. STEVENSON.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes, and for free banking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

Mr. PRATT. What is the motion?

The CHIEF CLERK. The motion is, in section 2, line 2, to strike out "1876," and insert "1877;" so that the clause will read:

That on the 1st day of January, 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay on demand, &c.

Mr. MORTON. I inquire whether that motion is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SHERMAN. In what respect?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate will indulge the Chair a moment, he will state. By Rule 12, of the Senate Rules, a motion to strike out and insert is one proposition. This bill being before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] moved to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting certain other words. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] moved to amend the words proposed to be inserted. That was an amendment in the second degree. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] then moved to amend by striking out the second section, a part of the bill covered by the motion of the Senator from North Carolina. This the Chair held to be an amendment in the third degree, and out of order. Thereupon the Senator from Illinois withdrew his motion, and the Senator from Indiana renewed his, to strike out the second section of the bill. Now the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] moves to strike out a part of the second section, covered by the motion of the Senator from North Carolina. This presents the same question which was ruled by the Chair when the Senator from Indiana first made his motion. As the correctness of the Chair's ruling at that time was doubted by some Senators of great experience, and whose opinion is authority, the Chair has carefully reconsidered the subject, and, after consulting the books, is of the opinion that the ruling was correct.

The rule in regard to amendments is one of convenience merely, and designed to prevent the confusion which would result from piling proposition upon proposition without end. The rule of parliamentary law is that amendments can only be moved in the second degree; that is, there can never be more than three undetermined propositions before the Senate at any one time: first, the bill; second, an amendment; third, an amendment to an amendment.

The matter may be more clearly presented by employing mathematical formula. A bill is under consideration. It is moved first to amend by striking out A and inserting B. Second, it is then moved to amend by adding to the words to be inserted. The proposition then is, will the Senate strike out A and insert B plus C? This is an amendment in the second degree, and is a third undetermined proposition. The Senate must then vote upon the third proposition, after which another third proposition may be presented, upon which the Senate must next vote, and so on. But when in this attitude of the question, the Senator from Indiana moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which was covered by the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, and involved in the proposition presented by the motion of the Senator from Illinois, he presented a fourth proposition, namely, will the Senate strike out A minus D and insert B plus C? Had the Senator from Indiana moved further to amend the words to be inserted, it would not be questioned that such a motion would have been out of order. Does it alter the case that his amendment was directed to the part to be stricken out, instead of to the words to be inserted? The Chair thinks not.

The object intended to be secured by the rule must be kept in view, which is, not to multiply beyond three the undetermined questions before the Senate. When a motion is made to strike out and insert, a motion may then be made to amend the bill and it takes precedence, because the friends of the bill ought to be allowed to perfect it before the vote is taken on striking out; but if the motion be first made to amend the words to be inserted, then the limit of undetermined propositions is exhausted and the Senate must come to a vote before a proposition can be entertained to amend that part proposed to be stricken out. So if the first motion made be to perfect the part proposed to be stricken out, that must be disposed of before a motion can be entertained to amend the words proposed to be inserted. Applying this principle to the motion of the Senator from Maine, the Chair must hold that it is out of order.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to understand the decision, because it may be very material in the consideration of this bill. I beg leave to put a case to the Chair. We will suppose the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to be voted down, then we have but one amendment and that is in the first degree—the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. But we have two questions before the Senate, the original bill and the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina. Now I understand the Chair to rule that you may raise a third question by moving to amend the text of the original bill. But suppose a motion is made to amend the text of the original bill by a friend of the bill, and then a motion is made to amend that amendment, which would be perfectly proper if the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina were not before the Senate, for then there would be but three questions. If I understand the ruling of the Chair, that cannot be done, for that would make four questions. If that is the rule—I do not say that it is not, for the Chair is much more familiar with the rules than I am—I must say that it would most materially embarrass those who would perfect the original bill, because by having simply a motion to strike out the whole bill, you prevent any amendment to the original bill except what would be proper if there were no motion to strike out; that is, you prevent everything except an amendment in the first degree. In other words, you cannot have an amendment in the second degree for the purpose of perfecting the original bill; that is cut off by this motion to adopt a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regards that as settled entirely by the twelfth rule, which declares that a motion to strike out and insert is one and an indivisible proposition. If so, that is certainly the first amendment. Then, whether an amendment be offered to perfect the bill or to perfect the amendment, it is a second amendment, because the part to be stricken out is as much a part of the motion as the words to be inserted; and an amendment to either must be an amendment to an amendment, after which no further amendment can be offered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not propose to raise a question of order here, or rather to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but I do propose to state my difference with the Chair. I think the Chair is clearly wrong in its ruling, and I will state in a very few words why I think so.

It is true that the rule of the Senate provides that a motion to strike out and insert shall be one motion and not divisible. That is clear. That is, when you move to strike out and insert, it is put as one motion. That is what the rule means, and it does not mean anything more; it does not mean anything less; but it does not mean to preclude the right of perfecting what is proposed to be stricken out when the question is put as one question.

Let us take this case precisely as it is before the Senate. There is the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] as an amendment to the original bill. If the other motion submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is not to be made distinctive and as a distinct proposition, not to divide it, however, then the Chair would be right. But your rule only provides that the question of striking out and inserting shall be put as one. That means that I cannot move to divide the question so as to vote first on striking out and next on inserting; but when I make my motion, it is not a motion in the fourth degree but a motion in the second degree upon another proposition. Why? You divide your proposition and you have virtually two substantial propositions pending before the Senate, or a proposition with two branches, either of which admits an amendment. My motion is therefore in the second degree, made to that of the Senator from Indiana, which is a motion absolutely distinct from the two first motions and on another branch, the form of the question really presenting two branches of the proposition. By that process, which I think has always prevailed in the Senate, the Senate are at liberty to perfect words in any proposition before they are stricken out. Under any other ruling what is the result? The Senator from Ohio has stated it. An amendment is made in the second degree, an amendment to it would be in the third degree, and you cannot dot an i or cross a t in the text of a whole bill; and we are compelled therefore to vote for it precisely in that form. The Chair would be clearly right if it were not that the matter before us has two distinct propositions; and when I say that, I do not mean to make the motion to strike out and insert a divisible question. The rule applies only to the simple question when the Senate shall vote, that you cannot allow them to strike out first and then insert. That is all there is in that; and under that view I have no doubt that my motion is right; but I take no appeal from the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure that the practice of the Senate has always been to regard an amendment in the nature of a substitute, when offered, as a separate text liable to be amended in the second degree, while the principal bill is also held open to amendment in the second degree. But if the Chair is now right, then the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is clearly out of order, or else the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is clearly out of order. If there is no proposition pending except the principal proposition reported by the committee, and but two amendments are in order to it, of course only two amendments can be pending; but there are now three amendments pending to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The third amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which the Chair rules out of order for that reason.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are now but two amendments; the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. There were three before, because the Senator from Illinois moved to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, on top of which the Senator from Indiana moved to strike out the second section, which the Chair ruled out of order. The present status of the bill is this: An amendment was offered by the Senator from North Carolina, which was certainly an amendment in the first degree; and then an amendment was offered by the Senator from Indiana, which the Chair thinks must be an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. THURMAN. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Illinois withdrew his amendment, and then the amendment of the Senator from Maine comes in.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as the practice is concerned, I do not think there can be much doubt, because we have always regarded an amendment in the nature of a substitute as a separate text open to amendment in the second degree. If the ruling of the Chair could be established as the rule for all time, I would not much object; but then the logic of the rule would require the amendment to apply as a modification of the first amendment. The Senator from North Carolina now offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute. That is open to amendment, but that is in the second degree. That amendment of the Senator from North Carolina ought to be open to an amendment to itself. That is an amendment in the second degree. But the logic of it would carry you to the opposite direction; if you can offer one amendment in the nature of a substitute then you can offer another amendment which has no bearing whatever, is not an amendment to the amendment at all, which is not an amendment to the amendment that is offered, but an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pardon the Chair a word. That is the whole gist of the question. If the amendment which is first moved to strike out and insert is one amendment, and Rule 12 says it shall be, then a motion to amend either end of it, that is the part to be stricken out or the part to be inserted, must be an amendment in the second degree. After you have got two amendments you cannot have a third; and the inconvenience mentioned by the Senator from Maine must certainly result, he concedes himself, after you have taken one step more; it is only a question of where you shall impose the limit.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chair regards the amendment of the Senator from Indiana as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it seems to me that that is illogical. That would prevent the Senate at all from maturing the matter that is proposed to be stricken out. If the Chair is now correct, then the Senate is utterly powerless to mature a proposition that is proposed to be stricken out. That certainly has never been the practice of the Senate, and it seems to me it would be exceedingly inconvenient in the ordinary management of the business of the Senate.

I beg the pardon of the Chair. As the Chair has undoubtedly looked into this matter at considerable length, much more than I have, I will not take an appeal; but I beg the Chair again to review the matter carefully, as I know he will. I do not care how it operates in this particular case; but it is manifest that while the Senate may desire to amend the second section, it would be grossly wrong in the management of any proposition to strike it out now. Although the second section may not meet the approval of the Senate in hæc verba, in the words in which it is written, yet a motion to strike it out ought to be defeated necessarily, because the Senate by an amendment may change it so that they would be willing to have it remain in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pardon the Chair. There is no doubt that after the Senate shall vote on the third proposition or second amendment, whether it be to the bill or to the substitute, that is disposed of. There are then but two propositions before the Senate and but one amendment; and other amendments can then be moved either to the bill or the substitute.

Mr. THURMAN. It is in order now to appeal, I believe, from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Several SENATORS. O, no; do not appeal.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it is a question of too much importance really to stand as the ruling leaves it; and as the ruling of the Chair is, according to my recollection, contrary to the ruling of the Senate, and would be productive of very serious embarrassment, I feel bound to appeal.

Now I wish to call, as briefly as I can, the attention of the Senate to the matter that is here really involved. It seems to be conceded on all hands that the friends of a measure have a right to have that measure perfected, as it is called; that is, it is to be put in such shape as the friends of that measure—if they are able to do it, if they can command a majority vote for it—may think proper to put it before the motion is put on striking that out and substituting something else for it. It seems to me it is impossible to give effect to that rule without considering the text moved to be stricken out and the substitute for that text as independent things, each of which may be amended in the second degree.

I did not think the decision of the Chair was right the other day when the Chair ruled that the motion of the Senator from Indiana to strike out the second section was out of order; and why not? The Chair ruled that that was out of order because there were two amendments already pending, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina and that of the Senator from Illinois, and therefore that until the Senator from Illinois should withdraw his amendment, or the Senate should vote it down, the Senator from Indiana could not move to strike out the second section of the bill. We do not consider, in determining this question, whether the Senator from Indiana was opposed to the original bill or not. A friend of the bill might have made the same motion, thinking that that would perfect the bill. So the distinct question was raised by that motion whether or not the original bill is to be considered as one text in respect to being amended, and the substitute is also to be considered an independent text in respect to its being amended.

But now, if the ruling of the Chair shall be maintained and be fixed as the rule of the Senate, see what the consequence will be. The Chair says that when the vote has been taken on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois the result must be one of two things: either that amendment will be rejected, or it will be adopted; if it be rejected, then there will be but one amendment left, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; if it be adopted, it becomes incorporated with the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and there is but one amendment, and that is an amendment in the first degree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then a motion to amend the bill is in order.

Mr. THURMAN. Then a motion to amend the bill is in order; but just see where we are placed. If a motion is made to amend the bill, that is an amendment in the second degree by this ruling, and that cannot be amended at all. We are obliged to vote on that. It is very true that we might get rid of that by voting it down and then offer the very same thing with the change that might be desired, or move so much of it as might be desired; and so you might go on; but where would be the end of such a thing as that, and how many votes would be necessary? The truth of it is that the ruling of the Chair comes to this: that in perfecting the bill by the friends of the bill, no amendment shall be received except in the first degree. The fact that the enemies of the bill have a substitute pending is to restrict the rights of the friends of the bill to offer amendments in the second degree. If that is not a limitation, and a most destructive limitation, of the right to perfect the original text, I do not understand it; and it does seem to me that has not been, according to my observation, the usage of the Senate heretofore, and that it ought not to be the usage, because it would be destructive of the very valuable right of perfecting the original text.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it is apparent to every one, I presume, that it is more important that this decision when made shall be made right than that it shall be made in any particular way. It has no significance or importance as presented now; and although I thought the Chair was in error the other day, when the ruling was first made, I am not so confident of it this morning. I am well aware that when the present occupant of the chair sits up with a question of law over Sunday, he is very apt to be right about it on Monday, unless there is some special reason for being wrong. I rose to ask if there was any objection to the motion made by the Senator from Maine being withdrawn at the present time. It is in his power, I suppose, to withdraw it if he chooses to do so. I hope he will do so; for I should rather not vote on this appeal until I have had some opportunity to look at the question itself.

Mr. MORTON. The question raised by the Senator from Maine can be offered in another way.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am perfectly willing, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw my motion to amend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine withdraws his motion to amend. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. MORTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to give some reasons, as briefly as I can under the ten-minute rule, why the motion to strike out the second section of the bill should not prevail.

Sir, we have determined by the vote of Thursday last that the maximum amount of United States notes shall be fixed at four hundred millions. In voting for that increase, I have not for a moment lost sight of the fact that they are the nation's obligations which call for money, and that the good faith of the nation is as much committed to their redemption in coin as it is to the payment of our bonds. They constitute a part of our system of public credit, and are not the less to be cared for because the sphere of their employment is in conducting home exchanges. I cannot therefore vote for striking out the section in the committee's bill which makes provision for them in a way which does justice to the holder and maintains the public faith. It is too late to raise any question about what these greenbacks promise. The Supreme Court of the United States has settled that point, and we have settled it ourselves. The court said in 7 Wallace, 29, speaking through the Chief Justice:

> Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay the bearer a certain sum. The dollar-note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coined dollar of the United States—a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government. No other dollars had before been recognized by the legislation of the national Government as "lawful money."

It has furthermore declared that our legal-tender notes have the same exemption from taxation, State and municipal, which our bonds have.

So much for the Supreme Court.

Now, what has Congress declared? Five years ago, by solemn enactment, it said:

> And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

I could add nothing to this declaration of the court and promise by Congress by any words of my own. They are pledges by two departments of the Government—one as to what the nation is bound to do, the other what it will do.

Now, sir, we know the country is in no condition at this time to redeem this pledge, nor in the near future could it be done without producing disaster, since we have taken no measures looking to redemption, and the gold is not in the country to do it, and no one has been able to show how it is to be got here in sufficient quantity. What, then, is our only alternative? It is to do the next best thing in allowing the holders the right to exchange these notes for interest-bearing bonds. This is restoring a privilege they once enjoyed.

The Senate will pardon me for adverting briefly to the history of greenbacks. There were three acts of Congress authorizing their issue, adopted on the 25th of February, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863. Under these acts there have been four different issues. The maximum authorized was $450,000,000, but the highest amount ever in circulation, including the demand notes, was $433,160,569; and this limit was reached the last day of August, 1865. When, on August 20, 1866, the President proclaimed the rebellion at an end, it was a fraction short of $400,000,000, and has been at no time since so high.

The two first issues had printed on their backs this declaration: "Exchangeable for United States 6 per cent. twenty-year bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years." The third issue under the act of March, 1863, omitted these words and made them simple legal tenders, as does the last issue of the series of 1869, which has mostly absorbed the previous issues. But this right to exchange the legal-tenders for the five-twenty bonds was taken away after the 1st of July, 1863, by the act of March 3 in that year.

Now, sir, the second section of the bill reported by the committee, and which it is proposed to strike out, simply renews this privilege. It gives the holder of the greenback the right to demand, after a certain day, the coin or a 5 per cent. bond, at the election, not of himself, but of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Is this not honest? Is it not the least we can do for this dishonored paper? The citizen holding the greenbacks gets no more dollars by the operation, but he gets interest for being kept out of the promised coin. He gets a time obligation bearing interest in place of a due-bill which bears none.

But it is urged that to allow this will cause contraction, notwithstanding we authorize an expansion of forty-four millions. I deny this. Why and how should it cause contraction? You must in the first place demonstrate that the man holding $1,000 of legal-tender notes, which he can use at 10 per cent. profit, is going to rush to the Treasury and exchange them for a bond which yields him but 5 per cent. interest, half at most of the interest or profit he can make with his money. But it is said he will do this because the bond is worth its face in gold and a little over at this time. But that assumes, what is not proved, that the bond will continue to be worth that when the right of conversion is given.

This right of exchange will produce one of two results, either to bring the bonds down or lift the greenbacks up, and will probably operate both ways. The bonds will not certainly command a premium while the right exists of converting the whole four hundred million legal-tenders into them, and not only that, but of reconverting them as often as they shall be reissued. For you will observe, sir, that the notes when redeemed by a bond are not to be retired and canceled, but to be reissued and the notes so redeemed are to be used for two purposes: first to purchase or redeem our 6 per cent. bonds, and next to meet current payments for the public service.

Mr. MORTON. Will my colleague permit me to suggest that the section does not require them to be reissued, but leaves that matter discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. PRATT. I am aware of that. I will come to that directly. Of course as often as they are reissued they are liable to a fresh conversion, and so the process goes on indefinitely. This privilege, then, will prevent the bonds ever going above par.

Nor will this process increase the public debt, but will decrease the interest account. It will enable the Treasury Department to take up our bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest and ultimately fund the public debt at 5 per cent.

I cannot see, then, how a contraction of the currency will follow when this section provides against that event by clothing the Secretary with power to reissue all the legal-tenders presented for exchange. It has been well observed in the course of this debate that we have got to invest this officer with large discretionary powers. We have done so in the past and they have not been abused. It is not to be supposed for a moment that though there be no absolute compulsion on him to reissue he will refuse to do it if the public interest shall require. We have witnessed, sir, how he has yielded to the public demands since the forty-four millions were retired under the act of 1866—once in September, 1869; again in 1871 when the great fire occurred in Chicago, and again within the last five months when the forty-four million reserve was reissued to the extent of twenty-eight millions under pressing necessity. I make this reference simply to show that this discretion vested in the Secretary of the Treasury will always be exerted to prevent contraction when the public interest demands it.

A word more and I am done. I listen with impatience to the harsh criticisms pronounced here against our irredeemable currency, as it is called, when I remember what it has accomplished. Our public debt reached its highest point on March 1, 1866, when it was $2,707,856,000. By the 1st day of September, 1872, in the space of just six and a half years, it was reduced $564,500,000. It is true we realized a good deal by the sale of war materials, but by far the greatest part of this reduction was accomplished by the application of our revenues from taxation to the purchase of our outstanding indebtedness. Let us not forget that the wonderful prosperity of the nation, which enabled it for three years in succession to pay off one hundred millions a year of the public debt, occurred while we had no other medium of exchange than this irredeemable currency. Am I too bold in saying that this prosperity was promoted in a large degree by this very currency, in which the people had, and continued to have, such abounding confidence? Then let this section stand as it is. It but accomplishes what five years ago, in the act to strengthen the public credit, Congress pledged itself to do. Without this provision, or something similar, I do not see how the confidence of the public is to be maintained that the greenbacks will ever be redeemed or taken care of.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the remarks which have just fallen from the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.] They strengthen a hope I have cherished all along that this section was not so bad as I viewed it. I shall vote to strike out the section, because I must of necessity be guided in my own vote by my own judgment upon the merits of the section. Of course I have not any abiding confidence in the correctness of my own convictions. I know the Senator from Ohio, I know the Committee on Finance would not have proposed this section if they could have imagined that it would produce the results which I conceive will inevitably flow from it. When the Senator from Ohio, or the Senator from Indiana, or any other Senator, says that the Government has pledged itself to pay off its legal-tender notes at some time or other, they only assert what I have asserted over and over again. They assert what I had begun to feel was a truth which no man was left in the Senate ready to assert but myself. And when the Senator from Ohio says that this obligation being conceded, inasmuch as the Government is unable to redeem it literally by paying off its notes in coin, we cannot object to paying them in interest-bearing bonds, he argues as I have argued over and over again, and as I argue to-day. Every consideration of honesty and of good faith calls upon this Government to-day to allow the holders of these greenbacks to put them into interest-bearing obligations if they want to do so, and do it just as fast as it can be done without contracting the circulation and without inflicting an injury upon the debtor-paying portion of the country. So we are agreed on all that; but that is not the measure proposed by this section. This section does not propose to pay a dollar of your unredeemed promises. The first part of it is a proposition, as it seems to me, to make your greenbacks do double duty, to make them represent debt and money both at the same time. Now it will slip up on one of these enterprises. There is no invention, the wit of man cannot invent anything that can be both of these things.

Mr. President, the first part of this section authorizes any holder of legal-tender notes to put them into the Treasury and receive a 5 per cent. bond. Very well; that is a perfectly simple thing; and if it required these notes then to be canceled as a paid debt, I should have but one objection to it; I should say the process ought to be checked, controlled, guided a little with reference to the obligation of contracts already outstanding. But this section tells the Secretary not to destroy those notes; to keep them. What is the effect of that upon the country at large? That is contraction. Every million that goes into the Treasury is a million withdrawn from circulation, not obliterated to be sure, but it is locked up; it is out of circulation. What effect will the operation of that have? The Senator from Ohio knows, and we all know, that every autumn there is a portion of your speculators who operate for the express purpose of bringing about what they call a stringency in the money market. But a few years ago they succeeded in locking up, I think, $15,000,000 for a few days, and it made the country yell from one end to the other. Fifteen million dollars were locked up! They did it upon this penalty, that they lost the interest on the $15,000,000 while it was locked up. Consequently they could not stand that operation a great while. They could not afford to lose the interest on $15,000,000. With just such an operation as that in our eye, just such an operation as that known to our recent history, here it is proposed to order the Government to the front, to make it act as a great bear in speculation, and to say, "Here, bring your surplus notes to us; we will lock them up for you, and we will pay you 5 per cent. for the privilege of doing it." That is the effect it will have upon the business of the country.

What effect will it have upon the banks? You have authorized some banks, and some of you propose to authorize more banks. What effect will it have upon them? I agree with the Senator from Ohio that banks should be held to some sort of redemption. What sort? The only redemption that is worth a cent to the business of this country, and that is the obligation of redeeming their notes in lawful money; and I agree that the only lawful money ought to be that which is regarded as lawful money by the commerce of the world, and that takes its place as such in the commerce of the world. That is the only redemption that does any good. No other redemption is of any sort of importance.

What does this section propose? It proposes that the Government shall hire everybody to raid on the banks. You require them to keep a reserve of 15 or 25 per cent. in greenbacks or in lawful money. Now you propose to set the brokers to raiding on that reserve. They do not go for it now; they do not draw on it now at all. There is no use in their drawing on it. But the Government whets them on by saying, "Present the notes; pack your carpet-bag with bank-notes; traverse the country, draw the greenbacks, bring them to us, and we will pay you 5 per cent. for the privilege of locking them up in our vaults." That is the effect it has on the banks.

If the section stopped there I could not go for it; but these are not the worst features of the section. What effect is it going to have on the Government? I do not know that anybody cares what effect it may have on the Government; but if anybody does, what effect will it have on the Government? Your Secretary of the Treasury is set up there and he is bound hand and foot; he is charged with one duty, and that is to give to every man who shall bring him $1,000 in greenbacks a 5 per cent. bond for $1,000, if he cannot pay coin, and everybody knows he cannot pay coin, and will not pay coin. That might just as well have been left out; the bill would have been quite as intelligible, quite as candid, if that had been left out. Charged with the duty, then, of giving a $1,000 bond to every man who shall bring him $1,000 in greenbacks, he presides at your Treasury. You know, Mr. President, we all know, that every summer there is a large amount of money on which the holders are willing to take 4 per cent., or 3½ per cent. That money will go into the Treasury hereafter. The fall will find you with a vast contraction of your circulation. Now what is the Secretary going to do about it? This is money that he has in the Treasury; his vaults are swelled with it. He can do but two things with it: one is, to buy bonds again at such prices as the holders of the bonds are willing to take; and the other is to spend it in meeting our appropriations. My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] has flattered himself with the idea that men are going to crowd the Treasury with notes in exchange for 5 per cent. bonds, and that the Secretary is going to pay them out and get 6 per cent. bonds in exchange.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator has spoken ten minutes.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, I acquiesce; I did not know ten minutes were so short a time; but I have already said enough, I take it, to indicate why I shall vote for the amendment to strike out the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, to strike out the second section, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no right to speak on this amendment, having consumed my time and more already; but I merely rise to say that I have an amendment which I wish to offer as a substitute for this section, which I suppose under the ruling recently made is not now in order.

Mr. MORTON. It might be added as an additional section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think I shall vote against striking out the section, and move to substitute another one for it, if that will be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That may be in order if the section be not stricken out.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to make a suggestion to Senators who are in favor of doing something toward a return to specie payments, and that is, to vote against the motion to strike out this section. I know there are some features of the section which are objectionable to a good many of us; but by voting down the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] we may afterward introduce amendments and perfect it to the best of our ability.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I wish to say a single word in regard to the resumption of specie payments. I know it is very desirable, and I appreciate the importance of it as much as almost any man in the Senate; and I know that there is a great desire on the part of the mercantile community to have this Government pursue such a policy as to reach specie payments. But I regret to say that I do not see that that object is within reach immediately. I do not believe that the legislation of Congress can fix a time when the American people can resume and maintain specie payments. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States know enough to determine that time. Nor do I believe that specie resumption will come and be maintained in any other way than the way intimated by my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, when he spoke of its coming in a silent and quiet manner as the spring comes upon the earth. When it comes, it will come in accordance with the unwritten laws of commerce. They will bring about the day and the hour when you can maintain specie resumption. The best thing that Congress can do to secure specie payments is to adopt some system of legislation that will stimulate our industry and lead the American people to produce more than they now produce, so that they shall sell more than they now sell; and when the American people shall produce and sell more than they buy they can pay the balance in coin with perfect ease, because there will be no balance against us.

It is to my mind just as simple for the nation as it is for the individual. You could easily pay cash for everything which you buy for your personal expenses if your income were greater than your expenditure, because you would have the money with which to pay cash as you bought; but if your income be less than your purchases, you have to go on credit. So I think it is in regard to the resumption of specie payments by the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, a 5 per cent. bond is now barely at par in gold. We have had great difficulty in converting our 5 per cent. bonds into gold at par and taking up our sixes in Europe. This is a proposition to sell the same bonds at a discount in gold of 10 per cent. That is all it is. It must result in the depreciation of the bonds, or if it does not do that, on the other hand in a sudden resumption of specie payments, carrying with it disastrous consequences. It seems to me that this section is pernicious. It is not carrying out the pledge that was made. It is not proposing to pay the notes in coin, but it is proposing to elevate their value in a different way, and to do it in a manner for which there is no pledge, and to do it in a way that must result disastrously if brought about, if it has the effect claimed for it, injuriously to the country.

Mr. President, it was argued by a number of Senators upon this floor—I see them now sitting around me—that to invest the Secretary of the Treasury with the power to issue, or not to issue, at his discretion, the $44,000,000 reserve, was a power too great to intrust to the discretion of any one man; but this section gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to take into the Treasury one hundred, two hundred, three hundred millions of greenbacks if they shall be offered, and to hold them. If he is a contractionist in theory; if he believes that the legal-tender currency should be diminished—as many upon this floor do, and many outside of this Chamber do—he would hold on to them and contract the currency. We give this great power to one man, and its exercise depends upon his theoretical notions of what we ought to do in regard to the currency. If it is unsafe to allow to one man the question of issuing or not issuing $44,000,000, what will you say in regard to $382,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the first time in my experience in the Senate when I have ever seen the sharp tactics of cutting off all amendments to a pending proposition, or all amendments to amend a pending proposition. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] has been here many more years than I have. Here is a proposition involving questions of the gravest magnitude, and by parliamentary legerdemain we are prevented from amending it so that those who are in favor of the principle of it may vote for it. Now a proposition is made to strike out this section under circumstances which prevent our offering an amendment. That is a sufficient reason in itself why every Senator who desires to approach this matter fairly and in the true spirit of inquiry should vote now against the proposition to strike out, because if the section is amended so that the friends of it can unite on all the details of it, it will then be sufficient time to put the question of striking out.

But I wish to call attention to another point. We have been here now three or four months. When we came here $26,000,000 of the reserve had not been issued. Gold stood at 109, with a total volume of currency of all kinds approaching to $800,000,000. Gradually the Secretary of the Treasury, in the absence of revenue, has paid out $26,000,000—in other words, has increased the currency $26,000,000. What has been the effect on your currency? Gold has advanced 4½ per cent., from 109 to 113½. Thus you have inflated our currency $26,000,000, and you have depreciated its purchasing value 4½ per cent., or $36,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. What was the price of gold twelve months ago and nine months ago?

Mr. SHERMAN. I take the time when we had reached the maximum of $356,000,000. Before that time it was a little less, because some of it was in the Treasury. Here you have the fact proven before you that the issue of $26,000,000 of greenbacks has decreased the purchasing power of the whole mass of our currency $36,000,000. Senators, here is a bill which contains but one provision that looks toward the redemption of our broken promise; there is nothing else in it that looks like even a hope of the redemption of the notes. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] does not like it, because it does not go far enough; he says the promise was to pay gold absolutely. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] does not like it. He is in favor of more rapid and prompt specie payments than the rest of us are. Now, without any opportunity to amend the section and see whether or not we can produce a concurring mind, it is proposed to strike out of the bill the only provision that looks toward specie payments, or the redemption of the broken promises of the United States.

I trust, sir, that whatever may be its opinion as to the merits of this bill, the Senate will at least give us an opportunity to perfect it. If now you strike out this section, the only section which provides for redemption, and if you increase more and more the paper money either in the form of bank-notes or United States notes, I prophesy—no; I need not prophesy, because it is a mathematical fact—that to the extent that you increase your paper money, to that extent you depreciate its purchasing power. It is a proposition as strictly mathematical and as strictly certain as the motion of the planets in their revolving round.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The chairman of the Committee on Finance has stated what gives me the right to infer that the section in its present form is not just as it is wanted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not say it is not just as I want it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator has stated that if we strike out this section it is a resort to parliamentary tactics by which the friends of the bill are prevented from perfecting it. Now let us not be deceived on this question. If the section does not involve a correct principle, the bill is open to amendment by which the principle may be modified and adopted. But the Senator is well aware that if now under his intimation the Senate refuses to strike out the section, it is equivalent to declaring that they want it as it stands. If we refuse to strike out this section, we declare, negatively declare, that we want it precisely as it reads.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. THURMAN. Not at all.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I believe, as I understand the rules, that a motion to strike out being negatived is practically the same as an affirmative declaration to retain. I think I am correct in that, and therefore Senators who are opposed to the section have no other resort than to vote to strike it out. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has so well expressed my views that I will not repeat. The section is in the interest of contraction, and to show that that is the object section 4 contemplates contraction of greenbacks to go on until the maximum amount of greenbacks is reduced to $300,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that it has been said by the chairman of the committee that the issue of $26,000,000 of greenbacks has raised the price of gold. I show from the speech of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] that on the 30th of June last, long before the panic, gold was fifteen cents premium, and it was higher than that, but I have not the quotations here.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am opposed to this indirect method of contraction. I believe as firmly as has been expressed by the Senator from Indiana that the conversion into a 5 per cent. bond is direct contraction; and when we have by a majority of the Senate declared that the greenbacks shall be retained at a maximum of $400,000,000, that ought to settle that the Senate is opposed to contraction. It is proposed either under free banking or under the direct increase of $46,000,000 to increase the currency, notwithstanding which we are asked by opposers to indirectly contract the currency under the guise of giving and then taking, but taking more than is given.

If any tactics are to be attributed to members of the Senate, it strikes me it is to those who are defending this bill. We are seeking consistently to carry out the idea of a moderate increase of the currency to meet the expansion of the business of the country, simply that and nothing else; and in line with that we ask that this section shall be stricken out. If when the bill comes to the Senate any Senator sees fit to modify what is done in Committee of the Whole, he has his opportunity then. I have always been in favor of providing for conversion into a low-rate bond, but not such high-rate bonds as will offer an inducement to fund the currency and cause serious contraction. When you make a bond bearing 5 per cent. interest into which your currency is convertible, you make it an object to convert; but when you place it at say 3.65 per cent. interest, no more currency will be converted into them than can be spared from the business wants of the country.

Therefore I say the only remedy left to the friends of expansion is to drive out this section and to follow it up, and if no other does, I shall move to strike out section 4, which provides for contraction of the greenbacks to $300,000,000. Strike out those two sections, and then if there is a proposition for conversion into a moderate-rate bond I am ready to support it. I felt that we should understand clearly that a refusal to strike out is substantially declaring that we want it just as it stands; and believing that it does not express the wishes of the majority, let us strike it out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall not vote to strike out this section. At the same time I am not in favor of the section as it stands. I vote to retain it in order that I may have an opportunity to amend it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend from Vermont that he cannot possibly do that. By the rule it is provided:

> In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put for striking out. If on the question it be retained, it cannot be amended afterward, because a vote against striking out is equivalent to a vote agreeing to it in that form.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will ask the Chair, so that there will be no controversy about it, how that is? The right to amend this proposition has been denied—a ruling as certain to be reversed as the time comes. But I will ask the Chair now if it is not perfectly in order to move to amend this section by inserting words in any form or in any place?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) By striking out part.

Mr. WRIGHT. After the question shall be taken on striking out and that shall have been refused?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly you may move to strike out part and insert other words. It is open to any change or amendment.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let us not be diverted from the issue. The objection to this section is that it provides for 5 per cent. bonds. A refusal to strike that out is affirmative action of the Senate that we retain the 5 per cent. bonds, and the Senate cannot amend that point of the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can move to strike out "5 per cent." and insert "2.65" or "1.65" if he thinks that is necessary, or any other rate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should not be so unparliamentary as to offer such a motion after the Senate had refused to strike out the section. I should be precluded by the very rule which the Senator from Iowa has read in the hearing of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. That is not the rule. He read from the Manual.

Mr. SHERMAN. The twelfth rule regulates this, not the Manual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The Secretary will read the rule.

The Chief Clerk read the twelfth rule, as follows:

> If the question in debate contain several points, any Senator may have the same divided; but on a motion to strike out and insert, it shall not be in order to move for a division of the question; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition, shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor prevent a subsequent motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion simply to strike out prevent a subsequent motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Now, Mr. President, I think the rule read by the Secretary confirms what I stated, that the 5 per cent. interest cannot be stricken out. There can be no amendment of the section except there is something added that changes the terms of the section. After a refusal to strike out the provision for the conversion of these notes into a 5 per cent. bond, it is not competent for the Senate to modify that section by striking it out. I grant that other words may be added to the section; that a part may be stricken out and other words added that shall change the section. According to Jefferson a refusal to strike out is equivalent to agreeing to the words refused to be stricken out.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, much has certainly been said on this question. If I had time this morning I should like to make some remarks upon it, but I am admonished that I must be very brief. I am reminded that we are now in the condition of two mighty armies that were once drawn up, as I have read of. One of the generals riding up and down before his army remarked that he was no man of words; he was not for speaking; but one thing was very clear, and all could realize the fact. Said he, "There is your enemy; now you have either got to join in battle and whip them or they will whip you." That is our case this morning. We are pretty equally numbered here, those who are for coin and those who are against it and for inflation.

No man seems to be entirely ready to declare that the second section now under discussion is perfect. It may not be. For my part, however, making the best of a bad bargain, I would be ready to receive it; I am willing to receive it for one; but if it can be improved, I am surely for the improvement. I hope its friends will be able to improve it. But, sir, it has a smattering that I admire very much. It speaks of coin, and it is certainly in the interest of good faith. My distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] said it was in the interest of thus and so. It is very clear there can be no misunderstanding on that point, that it is in the interest of good faith on the part of this great nation. Can we afford at this day to act otherwise than in good faith?

My distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says that it is dangerous, very hazardous indeed, to add 5 per cent. in good faith to the payment of our bonds; that it will thereby depreciate the American bonds. That may be conclusively true; but what fact does it establish beyond all manner of doubt? That the other side of the question will depreciate the present currency. The one is as clear as the other, and I hold it to be much more so. Certainly, however, we know what is being done now. Senators may speak about last year or the year preceding, but it is sufficient that we now realize that gold is 13½ per cent. premium. Why is it thus? It is easily understood. The country is aware of what we are doing here; and with a continuation of this discussion, and a few more votes in the line that we have already had them, 15 per cent. will not be the total point of the premium; it will go to 25 per cent., and I know not where it will eventually land; it is all uncertain.

It is said that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," and I will illustrate the pleasing view that this section presents to me by a reference to the production of cotton. In the South you plant your cotton. You give it the proper culture for a short time, and then they begin to tell you that the cotton-bloom is seen. That is very pleasing to the planter, and to the family around the social table. Soon after a white bloom is discovered in Jack's or Tom's plantation, as the case may be, and that is very gratifying indeed. What is that bloom? That bloom is a beautiful white flower. The next day it is a red flower. The farmer walks out and sees the red flower. So here in this bill he sees that in 1876 he can present his thousand-dollar bill, or any other given amount, to the Treasury, and they can either give him the coin, the white flower or the red flower, for whenever you see the red flower it is a demonstration that in a very few days you will be enabled to gather the cotton, the beautiful white fleece, first white and then red. Whenever a man can pick his cotton out of the field, he can get the gold for it in fifteen minutes, either in seed, or by baling it up and sending it to market.

I have heard it said that there will be no panic upon us until the next crop will be ready to be presented to the world. What are the facts? Three hundred million dollars' worth of cotton in the South wants no currency to move it. It has appreciated within the last two or three days. In Liverpool it has risen about a cent a pound. That is in gold. The $300,000,000 worth of cotton of the South can regulate the currency of this mighty nation, if the friends of coin, the friends of the integrity and the true faith of the nation, will only permit it to do so, if they will utilize it. There is no difficulty about the coin; the coin can be had.

But are we to be told that United States bonds will be depreciated if we declare that the Government, when they are not able to pay in coin as they have promised to do at the first practicable moment, will pay in a bond bearing interest? No, sir, it is good faith; it is honesty; it is a jewel, and the more you rub it the brigher it will shine. It will make our bonds better in the money markets of the world than they are to-day, because then they will be unstained; there will not be a blemish upon them, and everything will be sound at home and abroad, and the man who holds an American bond will be upon the same footing that the European bondholder is to-day personally or through his agents. Then there can be no misunderstanding.

But what will be the result if our distinguished friends who advocate the other side of the question in this instance are successful? They do not beg the question. They know and they are quite ready to proclaim the fact, and in that we have the essence of their propositions, that if their measures do succeed money will depreciate, and then our anxious friends on that line will know that they have a cheap article. I want no cheap article, whether it be domestic, plain calico, or silks, or broadcloth, or anything else. Give me a good article, and then I am at ease. What will your "cheap money" do? It will rob and beggar the laboring people and keep them to the grind stone with the perspiration pouring out of them, and they are to be preyed upon for the benefit of bankers and the moneyed men of the world. That is the whole of it. The man who labors daily for his subsistence wants no such money as is contemplated here.

The history of the world has been invoked for financiering capacity; all the lessons of life have been introduced here; but there is one authority that was not given us. I think it the one that should have been invoked, and I looked from time to time for Senators to do so. They were speaking of various authorities, but they never referred to Aladdin and his lamp. If they could only get the old gentleman to go along with his lamp and go through the various portions of the country where they want banks, and let him rub as much as they desire, and give them plenty of money, it would be all very well, until the proper time comes for it to vanish, and vanish it will.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to suggest to my friend that Aladdin made silver plenty.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I wish he could do it now. Then we would get Aladdin to help us to return to specie payments.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Iowa have raised a question that we ought to have settled, or understand very distinctly what will be the settlement of it before we come to vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana to strike out this second section. The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Iowa, if I understand them, maintain the proposition that if the motion to strike out shall fail, then that section cannot afterward be amended. Now, I want to know how that is. If that section cannot be amended, should the motion to strike out fail, I shall be compelled, with the views that I expressed the other day, to vote to strike it out; but if it can be amended, then I can vote, consistently with my views, to retain it in order that it may be made to satisfy my own opinions, if that result should be arrived at. I want to know, therefore, whether, if the motion of the Senator from Indiana to strike out shall be defeated, that section will or will not be amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read this unpopular twelfth rule. The last clause is as follows:

> Nor shall the rejection of a motion simply to strike out prevent a subsequent motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. THURMAN. That is all very true; but the question is whether there is to be any limited interpretation given to that last clause in the twelfth rule, that where a motion is made to strike out, the defeat of that motion shall not prevent another motion to strike out and insert; and in that way you might amend by making motions to strike out and insert; but must you do it in that form? Are you compelled to go about in that indirect manner to do it? May you not amend the text at once without moving to strike out, by adding to it or by changing a part of it? Are you driven in the very language of the twelfth rule to move to strike out the whole section and insert it in a new form? That is the question I want answered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that before the motion made by the Senator from Indiana was made any Senator could have moved to strike out a part of the second section and insert other words; but when the Senator from Indiana made his motion, he had then an amendment to an amendment pending, and the Senate must come to a vote upon that before there can be any more amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair this question, which covers my colleague's point: If this proposition of the Senator from Indiana is voted down, is not the section as much open to amendment as it was before when the bill was reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to every amendment except the one which the Senate has rejected, simply to strike it out.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the rule undoubtedly.

Mr. THURMAN. I think so, too, because I think if you can move to strike out and insert, which would be to move to strike out the section, after this motion had been rejected, and insert it in a new form with a little addition or omission——

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, I beg to suggest to him that I think this is the history of that rule: The announcement just made by the Chair without the rule would not have covered the case provided for by the rule, because it would be a repetition of the motion to strike out. Therefore the rule was made to provide for that one case; and now with the rule I cannot doubt that the Chair lays down the law precisely as it is, that it is open absolutely to all amendments. Without the rule there might be a doubt about the motion to strike out and insert being in order after a motion to strike out had failed.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the decision of the Chair is right. All I wanted to know was, what was the decision.

Now, I must say upon this subject that I do not understand the object of this motion made by the Senator from Indiana. Is he opposed to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina and to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, and does he want to perfect this bill in order that, having perfected it, he may vote down their amendments? What is there in this bill that meets his approbation and makes him anxious to retain it, so that it being retained he will vote against the proposition of the Senator from Illinois and the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina; or I might say the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, for that covers the whole proposition of the Senator from North Carolina? Is it as a friend of this bill that the Senator from Indiana moves to strike out this section? I should like to have his views on that, and an explanation of the reasons that induce him to make a motion which puts the friends of the measure at the disadvantage that they cannot change one single word in the text of the bill by any amendment in the second degree. Is that friendly to the bill—that which limits their power to perfect it in the extraordinary way in which it is limited by the decision of the Chair, made this morning? If, on the other hand, he is not a friend of the bill, but is a friend of the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, why does he trouble the Senate with a motion to strike out this particular section? Here is a motion to strike out the whole bill, made by the Senator from Illinois. If the Senator from Indiana is in favor of that proposition, why not take a vote on that? Why not stand on that, and let us see what will be the result of that vote? Why come in as an enemy of the bill to do that which it is the office of the friends of the bill to do?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. Before taking my seat I wish to say that I shall vote against striking out this section in order that it may be in the hands of its friends to perfect it. If it be made to conform to what my judgment is, then I can ultimately vote for it. If not, my objections remain to it precisely as they were before. I shall vote against striking it out, therefore, not because I approve of it in its present form, but because I prefer to leave the bill in the hands of its friends instead of its enemies.

Mr. LOGAN. I have but a word to say. Inasmuch as the propriety of these motions is questioned all the time, I presume we have as good a right on our side, if I may call it such, to make a motion of this sort, as Senators have who try to perfect a bill that they do not intend to vote for. It looks as though this bill might be perfected in such a manner that enough of us on this side would vote against it, and enough of the pretended friends of the bill vote against it, to defeat the whole proposition. That looks to me to be about the object to be attained by retaining this section. I have not yet heard a Senator who says that he will vote to retain this section who has not at the same time said he is opposed to the section, but will vote to retain it in order to get it in some shape, nobody can tell what, that somebody may vote for. I should like to know what kind of object that is. If the insinuation is that our object is not a fair one, what kind of object is to be obtained by retaining a section that you are not for, thinking that you may get something that you may possibly be for at some future time? That is the whole argument made in favor of retaining this section, except so far as the chairman is concerned. I presume he is for it; but I have not heard any other gentleman say so.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I think your time is up.

Mr. MORTON. My friend, the Senator from Ohio, thinks my time is up. I hope he will remember and keep as good an account of his own time as he does of mine.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us stand by the rule, unless it is abandoned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the record of the debate kept by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] in the absence of the present occupant of the chair, the Senator from Indiana is only charged with the time he commenced. How long he occupied, the present occupant of the chair does not know.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I merely wish to say, in answer to my friend from Illinois, that I am not in favor of this section as it stands, but I mean to vote against striking it out, and for this reason: I want to amend it, and if I cannot amend it, I would rather have it than nothing.

Mr. LOGAN. The Chair has decided, however, that it may be amended if this motion fails.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll on the motion of Mr. MORTON to amend the bill by striking out the second section.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. WEST. I should vote against striking out this section, and he would vote for it.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I suppose I am perhaps bound to withhold my vote on this question. I made an agreement with the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. BROWNLOW, and at his request I consented to pair with him; but I had no idea at the time the proposition was submitted to me that he was going home. I understand that is the case. I have acted in perfect good faith. I advised him this morning of the facts; but for the time being I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. KELLY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLAYTON; at least I shall so consider myself for a day or two longer. He would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SCOTT, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON,] who is absent on account of illness in his family. If he were present he would vote for this proposition to strike out and I would vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS, (when Mr. STEVENSON'S name was called.) The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] was called home suddenly by the death of his friend and law partner, and he requested me to announce the fact, and also to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. DORSEY.

Mr. STOCKTON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. RANSOM, who is necessarily absent from the city. If he were here, I presume he would vote "yea;" I should vote "nay."

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) I announced last week that I was paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS, on this question. That pair still continues, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and Windom—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, Lewis, Ransom, Scott, Stevenson Stockton, West, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was agreed to; and the second section of the bill was stricken out.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] by adding to it the following section:

That on the 1st day of January, 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay, on demand, at the offices of the assistant treasurers in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and New Orleans, to any holder of the United States notes to the amount of $100, or any multiple thereof, in exchange for such notes, an equal amount of any coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service, adding to the present form of said notes a provision making them redeemable at the option of the Government in coin or in United States bonds of the description hereinbefore mentioned. And the said bonds, and the interest thereon, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania moves that amendment to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer the following section as a substitute for section 3 of the bill reported by the Finance Committee——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is out of order at present. The amendment can be reported for information if the Senator desires it, to be moved at the proper time.

Mr. MORTON. Is it the same amendment that the Senator offered before?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir, with the exception that I have changed the word "twenty-seven" to "twenty-two," in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT;] and I have also left out the second section of the amendment. It is the first section of the amendment I offered before, which is the free-banking section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to give notice of an amendment which I send to the desk, not interfering with the Senator from Pennsylvania and not detaining him to have it reported. It is the amendment that has been placed on the tables of Senators.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not rise to occupy my ten minutes in discussing the amendment I have offered; but as from its reading it may have struck some Senators as being an amendment of some length, I simply wish to explain wherein it differs from the section which has just been struck out. The differences in the two are these: This amendment omits the provision for the redemption of the United States notes in coin, and fixes the 1st day of January, 1877, as the time for the commencement of the redemption of the notes in bonds. It provides that the notes may be retired at five distinct points of redemption in amounts of $100, instead of confining the place of redemption to one in sums of $1,000; and it provides that after these notes are redeemed, when reissued, the form of them is to be changed so as to make them redeemable at the option of the Government in coin or in the same character of United States bonds. Those are the differences between this section as proposed and the section which has been stricken out. I would have voted, had I not been paired, against the striking out of that section for the purpose of amending it, and I now offer this amendment for the purpose of getting a vote on this proposition.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to propose a 5 per cent. bond?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will he modify that to a three sixty-five bond.

Mr. SCOTT. Not at present.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment contains a very radical change in the character of the currency. It provides that when these greenbacks shall come into the Treasury on the purchase of these 5 per cent. bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury may cancel them, and that he may reissue a greenback in a new form—a greenback not payable in coin, as the character of the present promise is, but a new greenback which may be paid by the Government in a bond, changing the character of the new currency to be issued. Thus we should have two different kinds of greenbacks in circulation. I suppose the intention is that the new greenback shall also be legal tender like the old one.

Mr. HOWE. How is that?

Mr. SCOTT. The form of the note is only to be changed by adding to it that it is redeemable in coin or in bonds of the description mentioned in the section, which, of course, retains the legal-tender feature of the note.

Mr. MORTON. It occurs to me that this amendment is, if anything, more objectionable than the other section. It introduces a new species of currency and unnecessarily complicates our financial system for no benefit whatever that I can see.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me that my friend from Pennsylvania has taken a step in advance of any Senator here upon this floor. He proposes that we shall retire anything that bears the semblance of future redemption in coin, and start entirely on a basis of paper. We are first to redeem the notes that are now outstanding, not in coin, as the Senator thinks we are under obligation to do, but to redeem them in paper, and then thereafter to go on promising no more than what we can perform. It reminds me of the witness who, upon a cross-examination, was very much embarrassed by his testimony. The lawyers were in a wrangle whether he should be permitted to proceed after it was clearly proven that he had perjured himself. He interrupted and said, "May it please the court, if you will allow me to go on now, I will tell the truth." [Laughter.] So the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to withdraw the currency out that we cannot redeem without falsifying our promise, and then to go on in a manner that will be truthful; that is to say, we shall be able to do all we promise, that is to redeem the legal-tenders in paper and in nothing else.

There are other objections to this proposition, but I think that the Senate is hardly ready to proclaim on the very face of any act we shall pass here that we are never by any possibility to return to the standard currency of the world.

Mr. SCOTT. I would make an entirely different application of the story given to us by the Senator from Vermont about the witness telling the truth. I have argued upon the floor of the Senate, and I have heard very few combat the argument, that this idea of redeeming and continuing to redeem in coin the amount of paper circulation which is needed for the proper transaction of business in this country is a fallacy and a delusion. I have argued that for ten years to come, with our outstanding debt, with the production of silver and gold in this country, and with the export of bullion going on to as large an extent as our whole production, the resumption of specie payments is far in the future; and, sir, believing that, finding so many Senators who are arguing upon different sides of this question believing the same thing, I am for telling the truth and saying that we cannot redeem these notes now, but that we will redeem them in the next best thing we have to give—the bonds of the Government bearing interest. And when these legal-tender notes are thus redeemed, I hold that we have satisfied the obligation contained in our pledge of 1869, and redeemed these notes in the equivalent of coin; and having redeemed them, having them in the Treasury of the United States, I am then for going on with the Senator's witness and telling the truth again, and when they are reissued saying to the holder of the note, "You will get coin when the situation of the country is such that we can give it to you; and when we cannot, you shall have bonds in redemption for this legal-tender note."

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me that a very striking objection to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that it is simply increasing the bonded debt of the United States in the first instance to the extent of $400,000,000; and after that, again to $400,000,000; and so on as often as the paper mill of the Government be put in operation. Here it appears in the naked form of the proposition. If there were a proposition before the Senate for a loan bill of $400,000,000, the bonds to bear 5 per cent. interest and run for ten years, we certainly would debate that with great anxiety and care, and my impression is that the Senator from Pennsylvania himself would cast his vote against it. He would be apt to say, so would we all, that if the Government needs this additional amount of money, needs that this great addition shall be made to its bonded debt, as an alternative proposition, we had better increase taxation, either the tariff or the internal revenue; that we had been improvident in reducing them; and let us bring into the coffers of the Government from the present generation a portion of this enormous expenditure. But here in the most insidious form, without the observation and without the direct action of Congress, without declaring what we intend shall be the result, we propose to increase indefinitely the bonded debt of the United States. I cannot vote for this proposition.

This gives an opportunity to say, as to another amendment referred to by the Senator from Indiana, that that section did not produce this result; at any rate, that it was in a very modified form; and before it would have full operation Congress could intervene and prevent such unexpected operation from it. But here, the only and direct effect of this amendment must be to enormously increase the bonded debt of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my friend if there is any difference in the two propositions except as to the new money to go out? In one case the promise is to pay in gold, and in the other case to pay in gold or bonds. Is not that all the difference?

Mr. SARGENT. I admit the other proposition was liable to some of these objections to a certain extent. This is certainly objectionable to the very fullest extent. I think we ought not to emit greenbacks for the ordinary expenses of the Government if we ever intend to redeem them. We may emit them to pay the Government debt, thereby reducing its general volume; but when we receive them and fund them, and then emit them again for the ordinary expenses of the Government, we simply are creating a continual debt; and under the operation of this amendment I can see no end to it.

Mr. HOWE. I will not attempt to make any argument against this amendment, because I know I should not say what I want to say in ten minutes. I will make one remark: I tried to make a motion when I was on the floor before against the second section of the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, and other Senators who think with him generally, have said over and over again that they did not want to violently contract the currency; and, on the contrary, they were very much opposed to expanding the currency. Now it seems to me impossible that any Senator will look at this amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and not admit that it will do both these things: that it will contract the currency at one time very violently and very sharply, and at another time it will expand it very freely and very largely. As the Senator from Maine by my side [Mr. HAMLIN] says, that makes an elastic currency—altogether too elastic for business purposes. You might just as well put the business of this country into a crushing-mill; it would operate upon it in the precise way, pinching it very hard at times and then loosening it altogether at other times.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania as to the legal effect of the change in the character of the note which he proposes; whether it is not substantially a new note when reissued, not the old note simply, but whether he does not provide for an issue of substantially new notes?

Mr. SCOTT. That is a question which the Senator from Maine can answer as well as I. The amendment provides for a reissue of an equal amount of these notes, simply adding this provision. Whether that is or is not a reissue of these notes, I suppose, presents the same question which has been presented here every time that legal-tender notes have been reissued. They were first fundable in bonds, and afterward they were directed to be reissued, and that condition was taken away, although it was not, I know, on the face of the note. The condition was in the law, and there was as much of a change, and just as great a change, in that respect, as this proposes to make.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The significance, if there is any at all in what I suggest, would be owing to the difference of circumstances under which we are acting. All these notes originally were issued as war measures in the exercise of an extraordinary power without which there was no pretense that we could issue them. Of course the exercise of that power would not affect the fixing of our own terms and conditions in regard to the note. But now all these things being changed, and we being now in a condition where we are to exercise simply the ordinary powers of legislation, it becomes important to consider under what circumstances we can reissue at all. Of course I have heard nobody argue that we had the power to make an independent issue at the present time of legal-tender notes. This is not the time or the occasion, nor have we upon any assumption which Congress ever made in the past, nor should we be justified by the decision of the Supreme Court in entering upon such a proceeding as that. Now this provides for a reissue of these notes under certain changes, with certain other conditions which give them a new character to some extent. My inquiry is whether (conceding now that we have the power to provide for a reissue) that is not such a change that it makes this a new note; and, if so, it falls, of course, within the objection that we are exercising that power in time of peace which I assume none of us have ever maintained could be exercised on such a question.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Maine starts a question about the power to issue legal-tender notes, one which of course I do not wish to provoke a discussion upon in ten-minute speeches; and, while I would prefer to have a vote upon that feature of the amendment, rather than embarrass any one who entertains doubts upon that question I will withdraw that part of the amendment which proposes to change the form of the notes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania modifies his amendment. It will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The modification is to leave out in the twenty-first line the following words:

Adding to the present form of said notes a provision making them redeemable at the option of the Government in coin or in United States bonds of the description hereinbefore mentioned.

So that the amendment now reads:

That on the 1st day of January, 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay on demand, at the offices of the assistant treasurers in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and New Orleans, to any holder of the United States notes to the amount of $100, or any multiple thereof, in exchange for such notes, an equal amount of any coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, may issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service. And the said bonds, and the interest thereon, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States as well as taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I always thought the second section of the bill, which the Senate have voted to strike out, very much of a financial conundrum. I would frankly state that I never could see the precise effect it was to have in the way it was intended to act; namely, as a step, longer or shorter, but still a step, toward the resumption of specie payments. That was the intent of the section which has been stricken out, and I understand the amendment now proposed is very much the same, with the important exception that in no event shall there be a payment of specie for United States notes of a like amount. The usefulness of this amendment I confess I cannot imagine. Its effect upon the currency I cannot imagine. It cannot be called either a measure of expansion or a measure of contraction, if it is coupled with the last section of this bill, which provides that nothing in the law shall be held to authorize an increase of the public debt. Without that last section, undoubtedly this would simply be a rapid system of conversion of a non-interest-bearing debt into an interest-bearing debt, and the reissue of the non-interest-bearing form ad infinitum, and that would be done without any special sanction of Congress. I think the Senator from California has very justly described what would be the operation of the law, and I think the Senator from Wisconsin also has described it that it might per contra be used as an extreme measure at times of contraction. I can see, therefore, no practical beneficial result to come from the proposed amendment; but independent of the possibility of its evil use, independent of mischief it might create even were it hampered by the operation of the sixth section of the bill preventing anything in the law from being construed into a power to increase the principal of the public debt of the United States, I should be unwilling to support it. Already the Government of the United States has established one law for the contracts of its citizens and another law for its own. The promises of the Government to pay to those who hold its Treasury notes are in plain, unmistakable language. They have been due and overdue in the hands of those who hold them since the day following their issue. Had they been the notes of an individual, they would have been protested. Upon the part of the Government this was unnecessary, because the mere authority that prevents the sovereign being sued is all that stands in the way of the enforcement of a plain legal contract. Whether it be becoming to the character of a government to shelter itself behind its authority and escape its just obligation by dint of that authority, I have a very clear opinion. I cannot believe that the scale of morals, that the touch-stone of right and test of right between a government and its creditors, should not be in all respects as lofty and as sacred as between the debt and credit of individuals. The Government of the United States having issued these promises to pay without date is by all construction of contracts between individuals bound in law, if a government can be bound in law, certainly bound in the morals that underlie all law, to keep its promise according to its contract, and that the Government of the United States has steadfastly refused to do.

Now, sir, it is bad enough to have this state of things existing without superadding new promises which shall be broken again. This proposition is very much what would be termed in law a plea not of payment, but of accord and satisfaction in discharge of a debt. It is a confession by the Government of the United States that they are either unwilling or unable to meet their contracts according to their terms, and therefore they will give something which shall be received as an accord and satisfaction, to wit, a new promise to pay secured by bonds with interest payable at the rate of 5 per cent. But then the money received for those bonds, that is to say the paper promises which are converted into those bonds, are again to be reissued, and at this time under a reaffirmance by the Congress of the United States that the paper so reissued is no more creditable than that which goes into the Treasury. I confess that I think the credit of this country is severely impeached by the whole system of finance upon which we are embarked; that the measures of Congress do not tend to give any hope that a proper sense of what I believe to be the honor, duty, and obligation of the country is recognized by Congress; that they propose again to signify that there may be reissued, as a novation of the old debt, these same old, discarded, dishonored promises of the Government. I can see not only no suggestion of a resumption of specie payments in this amendment, but rather an inferential resolve that specie payments shall not come again while the present sentiments and views of Congress prevail. It is a new decree of postponement of the performance of our promise; it is a new lease to irredeemable paper money; and as such it never shall have in any shape or form my vote in approval.

Mr. SCOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. I merely wish to say one thing. I shall vote against this amendment, without giving any other reason, because I am opposed to the 5 per cent. bonds. I shall not vote for such a bond or a bond with that rate of interest or anything more than 3.65 per cent., unless I am compelled to do so as a matter of compromise as the best I can do. I shall vote against this amendment for that reason without giving others.

Mr. SCOTT. Upon this as upon other questions I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 6, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cooper, Cragin, Pratt, Sherman, Stewart, and Wadleigh—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Thurman, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and West—30.

So the amendment of Mr. SCOTT was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer now, to come in after the first section of the bill, the amendment which I send to the table.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted as section 2, as follows:

That the surplus revenues of the United States shall be used for the purpose of accumulating gold coin in the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury being nevertheless at liberty to sell such amount of said coin as may be necessary in order to meet the demands for currency for which the receipts of currency are not sufficient; and the Secretary of the Treasury may, from time to time, issue and sell such amount as may, in his discretion, be necessary and proper for the purpose in this section hereinafter stated, not exceeding $50,000,000 of coupon or registered bonds of the United States of the denomination of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, and free from all State or other taxation. And the proceeds of said bonds shall be used for the purpose of purchasing or procuring gold coin, which coin shall be employed for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender notes of the United States; and it shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, so soon as they shall deem it expedient, with such amount of gold as for the time being may have been accumulated, purchased, or procured as aforesaid, to commence and continue the redemption of said legal-tender notes, at such places as they may select; and the said legal-tender notes which shall be, as herein provided, redeemed shall not be issued for any purpose except in exchange for gold coin at par, and when so reissued shall be redeemable as aforesaid in gold coin; and any legal-tender notes which may at any time be redeemed shall be issuable in manner aforesaid in exchange for gold coin at par; but the amount of such legal-tender notes, including those which may be outstanding and those which may have been redeemed, shall at no time exceed the amount authorized at the date of the approval of this act: Provided, That if after the commencement of the said redemption the Government shall be unable to redeem a part of the said legal-tender notes in gold coin, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue the requisite amount of bonds of like terms and effect as those hereinbefore authorized, and therewith to redeem the said legal-tender notes, which he is unable to redeem in gold coin, by exchanging the said bond therefor at par.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has just suggested to me that he supposed I would have the grace to get up and explain this amendment, which I will do in a very few words.

The first provision in the amendment is simply that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to use the surplus revenues of the United States for the accumulation of gold coin, with a clause that he shall nevertheless be at liberty to sell such an amount of coin as may be necessary in order to meet the demands for currency, for which the receipts of currency are not sufficient. It appears by the statement which has been made here that if we could retain all the coin we got, and did not have to sell any of it, the surplus would be about $44,000,000 a year, or in three years $132,000,000. There may be a necessity to sell some part of that coin from time to time. This amendment does not interfere with this. I have only to say that that provision meets the approval, as the Committee on Finance know, of the Secretary of the Treasury, I having conferred with him, and he having, I think, submitted to them a like provision.

The next provision of the amendment is that the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time purchase coin, humoring the market, purchasing it as he has opportunity, for bonds, but the amount of bonds to be thus purchased is not to exceed $50,000,000. It is restricted to that sum, so that we shall not come to specie payments too soon. We have to rely for the accumulation upon the surplus of the revenue, excepting to this amount of $50,000,000. Then the amendment provides that the accumulation shall be used to procure gold goin, which shall be employed for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tenders of the United States.

The next provision is:

And it shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, so soon as they shall deem it expedient, with such amount of gold as for the time being may have been accumulated, purchased, or procured as aforesaid, to commence and continue the redemption of said legal-tender notes.

It does not fix a day, but leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary and the President when to commence this redemption; and I think there are great advantages in that provision. I will simply state them. If a day was fixed, that might have a tendency to increase the price of gold. If a day was fixed the notes might be hoarded with a view of being rushed upon the Treasury. If a day was fixed, that day might be the most unpropitious season imaginable to commence the resumption of specie payments. It might be as wild a thing to try the experiment of commencing specie payments on that fixed day as to put a ship to sea in a hurricane. Leaving the day unfixed, the public being informed of the accumulation, business adjusting itself to it, no obstacle would be thrown in the way, because if obstacles were put in the way resumption would be postponed until the occasion was favorable to resumption.

The next provision is that after the Secretary of the Treasury has got the legal-tender notes to par he may prevent the supply of gold in the Treasury being exhausted by reissuing these Treasury notes for coin at par and for no other purpose. Those who have controlled this measure by their votes hitherto will observe that in this provision there is nothing that looks to possible contraction. On the contrary, you are introducing into the circulating medium of this country the gold currents of the world. The only provision which looks to contraction is that which follows; and I think it is an essential one. I do not think it will produce contraction. In order to effect specie payments it must be inevitable; when resumption commences there is to be no failure; and therefore there is a provision here that if after the commencement of specie payments there should not be a sufficiency of gold, then, and only in that event, notes that are presented may be redeemed by bonds at 5 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he has objection to inserting after the word "sell," in line 8, "which shall be not below par in gold," so as to require the bonds to be sold for par in gold?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know that there would be serious objection to that, for I believe that 5 per cent. bonds are to-day at par in gold and a little above it.

Mr. SARGENT. It would certainly not be well for the Government to sell its bonds below par in gold.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know that I should have any objection to that, though I would much rather leave that discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury.

I will say further, out of the time of my friend from California as mine has expired, though not exactly in answer to his question, that one objection made to this measure was made perhaps in conversation by the Senator from Missouri, that this accumulation of gold would have the effect of raising the price of gold. That, I think, is a mistake. I think that the parties in Chicago who have the largest supply of wheat are the parties who regulate the price of wheat, and not the man who has not got any; and I think that if the Secretary of the Treasury had this accumulation of gold, he could control the price of gold. I have not put it in the section, but there would be no difficulty in issuing gold certificates on the pledge of bonds of the United States two dollars for one. There would not be the least risk in that; and if he had this accumulation the gold-brokers of Wall street would be emasculated of their power.

Another thing in reference to this proposition: it saves the Government the payment of interest. These legal-tenders being made convertible would be preferred to the gold, and we should redeem our pledge by the fact that anybody can have the gold for them that wants it.

Mr. SARGENT. Do I understand the Senator to assent to the amendment I proposed?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so modified.

Mr. MORTON. This proposition is, first, that the surplus revenues shall be retained in gold in order to accumulate gold to resume specie payments upon; next, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to sell 5 per cent. ten-year bonds to the amount of $50,000,000, the proceeds of which shall be used to purchase gold to put in the Treasury so as to acquire a sufficient amount of gold to authorize the Secretary to begin the work of resumption. When he comes to the conclusion that it is safe to begin, he begins to pay out gold for greenbacks. What, then, is to be done with the greenbacks? The greenbacks are to remain in the Treasury, unless somebody comes and offers to give gold for them dollar for dollar. Then the greenbacks may be reissued, but not otherwise; and as it is not very probable that anybody would do that, the greenbacks taken to the Treasury in this way would be a contraction to that amount.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not contraction if gold comes out for the greenbacks. The gold would supply the place of the greenbacks.

Mr. MORTON. The gold would supply the place of the greenbacks provided you have come to specie payments and gold is no longer in demand, but takes a part in the circulation; but if you have only got $100,000,000 of gold, you can pay that all out, and that becomes a commodity the very moment it leaves the Treasury, and the currency of the country is short $100,000,000. That is the effect of it. But now comes the proviso which changes the whole character of this proposition, and makes it something entirely different:

Provided, That if, after the commencement of the said redemption, the Government shall be unable to redeem a part of the said legal-tender notes in gold coin, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue the requisite amount of bonds of like terms and effect as those hereinbefore authorized, and therewith to redeem the said legal-tender notes which he is unable to redeem in gold coin, by exchanging the said bonds therefor at par.

In other words, the Secretary under that proposition might commence specie payments to-morrow with only $50,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, and when that is paid out he is then authorized to give in exchange for the greenbacks a 5 per cent. bond. That operation may be commenced at once.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend permit me a word?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The resumption cannot commence unless the Secretary of the Treasury and the President shall deem it expedient with such amount of gold as for the time being has been "accumulated, purchased, or procured as aforesaid to commence and continue the redemption of said legal-tender notes." Now, we have the faith of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President that they will not commence this process of redemption until they think the state of the public market, the appreciation of the greenbacks by reason of this measure, is so that they can continue it; and it is only in the possible contingency of their being mistaken in that judgment that any resort can be had to these bonds.

Mr. MORTON. Why, Mr. President, this gives to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President of the United States if you please, with him, the right to determine when they will begin to redeem these notes. They may begin simply with the surplus revenues, or they may wait until they sell $50,000,000 of bonds. They may begin if they please with $10,000,000 in the Treasury, and when that runs out, then they are authorized to go on with 5 per cent. bonds, and the notes received in exchange for 5 per cent. bonds must remain in the Treasury until somebody comes and offers gold for those notes, dollar for dollar. In other words, it authorizes the contraction of the whole volume of currency, after the little amount of gold has been paid out with which the work of resumption begins. It may be commenced in sixty days. If the Secretary of the Treasury should believe that the currency ought to be contracted by taking in the greenbacks, it gives him the legal right to do it, after he has exhausted the very small supply of gold in the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. You hold that the effect of taking in a ten-dollar note, and paying out ten dollars in coin, would be withdrawing ten dollars from circulation?

Mr. MORTON. It would be, unless specie payments were completely restored, so that the coin would remain in circulation, as it would if you had enough, but if you have only a small quantity of it, not enough to resume specie circulation permanently, then all that the Treasury pays out goes as a commodity at once into the market, and not into circulation, and therefore the greenbacks received are so much taken out of the whole volume of circulation. The Treasury ought never to begin to redeem notes in coin until it has enough coin to meet all demands, so that when the coin is paid out, instead of becoming an article of merchandise, it becomes a part of the currency; and that can never be until you have got enough coin to insure the redemption of all the notes and to meet the foreign demand besides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Sherman, Stewart, and Wadleigh—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Tipton, and Windom—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, West, and Wright—29.

So the amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was rejected.

Mr. MORTON. I move to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. Has the Senator from Indiana any objection to postponing this motion until the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has been voted upon?

Mr. SHERMAN. I design now, as the Senate sees that this ruling of the Chair has embarrassed us, to move to strike out a word in the fourth section, for the purpose of taking the judgment of the Senate as to whether it is possible to conduct the business of the Senate within this restrictive rule now established for the first time in the Senate of the United States. I move therefore to amend the section proposed to be stricken out, by striking out "$382,000,000" in lines 7 and 8 and inserting "$400,000,000." I simply wish to raise the question formally as to the right to perfect the section proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, is that motion in order?

Mr. SHERMAN. The point is raised now; the question is presented by my motion to strike out the limit fixed at $382,000,000. Manifestly that ought to be struck out. It is an amendment that ought to prevail. It ought to be within the power of the Senate to perfect the section before the section itself is stricken out, because the Senate have by a vote adopted the maximum standard of $400,000,000; and yet now, by the operation of a rule for the first time established in the Senate for which there is no precedent—I say after inquiry there is no precedent for it—we are precluded by the motion to strike out that section from conforming it to the previous action of the Senate. I submit the motion now, instead of $382,000,000, the amount now named in the seventh and eighth lines, to insert $400,000,000, so as to conform to the vote of the Senate heretofore taken. I wish to know whether it is in order for me to make that motion?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if striking out section 4 would not conform to the previous action of the Senate on the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that presents a very different question; and that shows exactly the position in which we are placed. I will read the section, so as to show the embarrassment we are in in considering these things, and how much we are limited by the ruling of the Chair. Here is a section that provides that as new national-bank organizations are formed and as $1,000,000 of circulating notes are issued to them, $700,000 of greenbacks shall be retired. That is the substantial provision of the section, to provide for a gradual retirement of United States notes as bank-notes are issued; but there is in this section a reference to an aggregate volume of $382,000,000, while there is nothing at all in the bill now about $382,000,000. The $382,000,000 clause was stricken out; and now, if I cannot move to strike out $382,000,000 in this section and insert $400,000,000, the result will be that we are guilty of the absurdity of first declaring that the aggregate shall be $400,000,000, and in this section that the aggregate is $382,000,000, and by parliamentary law there is no way of correcting that!

Mr. MORTON. That absurdity is removed by striking out the whole section.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words, if there is the slightest variation, to the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t, or a misrecital of fact or a misrecital of a section, you cannot amend it; and the only way you can correct that formal error is by a motion to strike out the whole section and substitute a new section in correct form.

I do submit to my honorable friend who occupies the chair, for whose opinion I have high respect, that this ruling of his is too restrictive for us to conduct the ordinary business of the country upon. I will submit to his judgment this case: Suppose the legislative appropriation bill comes in here at the close of the session, and some Senator should move to strike out the whole bill and offer a substitute; that would be an amendment in the first degree. Then suppose some Senator, going over and considering the bill according to the ordinary mode, comes to an appropriation of $1,000,000 for a given purpose and he says, "Well, that is too high; instead of $1,000,000, it ought to be only $950,000." In that case we are not able to correct that $1,000,000 except by an amendment not going beyond the second degree, because that is all we can do within the ruling of the Chair. Suppose that then, while the legislative appropriation bill is pending, a single section is proposed to be stricken out; there is no power to amend it. There being one amendment to strike out the whole bill and to insert a substitute, and another amendment to strike out a single section of the bill, you cannot amend that which is proposed to be stricken out.

I have not examined the authorities, but I know that that is contrary to the established usages of the Senate. It will embarrass us very essentially; it embarrasses us now. No man in the Senate would vote against the proposition I submit to strike out "382" and insert "400," because manifestly it ought to be done in deference to the previous vote of the Senate; but now we cannot amend that section proposed to be stricken out unless the Senator from Indiana will kindly withdraw his motion to strike it out until we can make it conform to the previous vote of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. If the motion to strike out should be voted down, then the Senator will have the privilege of putting in "400" instead of "382," making it harmonious with the first section.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words, any Senator can come here with a motion to strike out the section and prevent us making the slightest change or modification in it. We are compelled to strike out in order to get in something that will correct an error or mistake—the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t. Suppose there was in this section a single thing that was wrong, an error of recital, and a Senator moves to strike it out, we cannot correct that error of recital and make it so that four-fifths of the Senate would vote for it; but we must strike out the section, and then put in something else.

Mr. LOGAN. Cannot the Senator renew that motion if this motion of the Senator from Indiana fails?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; then, in other words, we cannot correct any error in a substantial proposition pending before us unless we strike it out or refuse to strike it out, and then correct it.

Mr. LOGAN. You can correct it if the motion to strike out prevails; but if it was even corrected, with the restrictions there are in this section of retiring the greenbacks down to $300,000,000, I do not know who would vote for it. I should not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made the point to show that the restrictive decision made by the Chair will now practically prevent us from carrying on the ordinary business of the country in the old-fashioned way, which always regarded an amendment in the nature of a substitute as one proposition, and the original bill as still pending, each open to amendment in the second degree. I am quite sure that has been the practice, and it has been very common indeed. When a bill is introduced, and a substitute is offered, then an amendment is in order, either to the substitute or to the original proposition, in the second degree. It is true that might make pending, first the substitute and amendments to it, and then the original proposition and amendments depending on it; but that is the only logical way in which you can ever perfect a bill when a substitute is pending. Now I should like a vote of the Senate as to whether the decision of the Chair is right which constrains us from amending the section proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment on this question, which will be submitted to the Senate.

The Senate will do the Chair the justice to believe that it has no desire whatever to force any ruling on the Senate which is not entirely sound. It is not the duty of the Chair to make rules, or to amend them, or to shape them in any way, but simply impartially to administer them. It is true the inconvenience mentioned by the Senator from Ohio exists in the case put by him. It is equally true that that inconvenience always exists when as many motions to amend have been made as under the rules can be entertained. The difficulty here arises from the rule of the Senate. By the general parliamentary law—I read now from Cushing, page 526—

> This form of amendment—
> That is, amendments by leaving out and inserting—
> This form of amendment is a combination of the two preceding forms—

Namely, to strike out as a simple proposition and to insert as a simple proposition:

> This form of amendment is a combination of the two preceding forms, and when moved is treated precisely like two motions, and put consecutively to the question: first, to leave out the words objected to; and, secondly, to insert the other words proposed in their place.

By that general parliamentary law, unquestionably when a motion to strike out and insert is made, two propositions being before the Senate at once, they may go to the amendment of either. They may take up the original bill and move to amend it, and then move to amend that amendment. Then when they turn to the substitute, a separate proposition, they may move to amend that, and then move to amend the amendment, because there are two propositions which are to be treated consecutively before the body. But the twelfth rule of the Senate, it seems to the Chair, merges and consolidates them into one. When the rule says that that proposition to strike out and insert shall be an indivisible proposition, that it shall not be divided, then it is one. Therefore when a bill is pending and a motion is made to strike out and insert, everybody admits that that is an amendment in the first degree. What does the amendment cover? As much the words to be stricken out as the words to be put in. You may amend that amendment. But the general parliamentary law says that when you have got your second amendment you have got your three propositions; and beyond that they shall not be piled one upon the other. Suppose an amendment to strike out certain words and insert two sections, and some man moves to amend the first section proposed to be inserted; there is an amendment in the second degree, as everybody would concede. Could a man after that move to amend the second section? Clearly not, because that would be a third amendment. Why can he go back to the original bill any more than he can offer another amendment upon the words to be inserted? He can if there are two propositions pending; he cannot if the question is but one proposition. If the motion to strike out and insert is one amendment and not two; in other words, when Rule 12 changes the parliamentary law by merging the two motions into one, then all the consequences must follow; namely, that proposition or amendment which is to strike out and insert may be once amended; that is, one proposition may be made, and after that none can be, because otherwise you would have amendments in the third degree.

The Chair, after examining the matter very fully, and consulting with all the staff of the Chair at the desk before him upon all these questions, was confirmed in this opinion; and on Saturday took all the books he could find, and examined the thing thoroughly, for the mere purpose of ascertaining what was the exact, rigid, proper ruling upon this rule. That it works inconvenience the Chair sees as well as the Senator from Ohio does, in the particular case; but it is quite within the power of the Senate to reverse the ruling and make a new rule, for that is the effect of it.

It is said that there are no precedents for this ruling. The Chair is informed that the point of order has never before been raised in the Senate. If it had not been raised at this time, of course the Chair would not have ruled upon it; but when a point of order is made under the twelfth rule, the Chair has no discretion about it. Convenient or inconvenient, the Chair must enforce the rule; but of course he has not the slightest feeling about his ruling. Whether it shall be overruled or not is a matter for the Senate to decide; and the Chair will now submit the question to the Senate, whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio shall be received.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read the parliamentary law, which it seems to me is very plain, laid down in Jefferson's Manual, and see whether that is changed by the rule. I desire in the first place to say that I do it not for this particular case, but to establish a precedent. A precedent once established here is always followed on parliamentary questions:

> In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out.

Here the Senator from Indiana moves to strike out a section which has some defects in it according to the previous votes of the House. Surely the rule of parliamentary law comes in and says the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put on striking out. That is the plain, ordinary course. But the Presiding Officer says that the twelfth rule denies that. Here I think is the basis of the error. This rule provides:

> If the question in debate contains several points, any Senator may have the same divided; but on a motion to strike out and insert, it shall not be in order to move for a division of the question.

Ordinarily if you make a proposition which contains two substantive propositions it can be divided, any Senator can demand a division; but an exception is made against that right to demand a division as to a motion to strike out and insert. By parliamentary law a motion to strike out and insert was divisible; but that was found to be inconvenient; and therefore the Senate at some previous time limited the power to divide a question of striking out and inserting. They have simply changed in that respect the parliamentary law. They have not changed the parliamentary law in any other respect. And yet upon that clause of the rule the Chair has placed a construction which, if sustained, will very much embarrass us:

> But the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition.

Here a motion is made to strike out a section. Surely it must be in order for another Senator, the question being open to perfect the section that is proposed to be stricken out, to amend the section to make it so that a majority of the Senate would not desire to strike it out; but if the Senator from Indiana insists upon his motion to strike out, he may prevent the Senate from having a vote on the merits of the proposition at all, because the proposition may be so worded as to be ungrammatical or faulty, or its meaning may have been so changed by the previous votes of the Senate as to demand amendments. If there is no way to amend it, if we have got either to vote to strike it out or take it as a whole, almost any affirmative proposition would be stricken out. That, it seems to me, reverses the whole logic of parliamentary law which is intended by simple and plain rules to enable the majority to perfect the proposition before it, to reach a vote on the substantial points, and settle the matter in that way. If we are prevented, by this motion to strike out the whole section, from passing our judgment on the details of this section, the merits of it, the words of it, the grammar of it, we must take the vote as a whole. It seems to me this would be embarrassing.

Mr. THURMAN. With great respect for the opinion of the Chair, it does seem to me that the vice of this ruling consists in this: that it treats a motion to strike out the whole of the bill and insert a substitute for it as the first amendment within the meaning of that rule which says that amendments shall not go beyond the second degree. That, in my judgment, is the fundamental error. I think that according to the usage of the Senate, and according to the requirements of reason, a motion to strike out the whole bill and insert matter in lieu of it ought to be treated for the purposes of amendment as a distinct proposition, and the bill as another distinct proposition.

Mr. HAMLIN. And always has been.

Mr. THURMAN. If this is not the case, just let us see what will happen. If this is not the case, you utterly deprive the friends of the measure of an opportunity to perfect it before the motion is made to strike out. Suppose a bill to consist of two sections, and the opponents wish some substitute for it or do not want the substitute at all, and they agree among themselves that Senator A shall move to strike out section 1, and Senator B shall move as an amendment to that to add "and section 2." The two sections together, therefore, embrace the whole bill. Then you cannot perfect the bill at all; you cannot even correct a reference to a statute, or a date, or anything, until when? Until a vote has been taken upon the second motion that was made; and when you have done that, then the same thing can be repeated again, and again, and again, for just as often as you have voted one down, another motion may be made by whoever may get the floor first to strike out some portion less than the whole of the remainder of the bill; and thus you put it out of the power of those who are in favor of the bill to perfect it before the motion to strike out is carried. Or if a motion is made to strike out the whole bill, and somebody moves as an amendment to that to add something to it, however trivial it may be, then you have two motions to amend according to the ruling of the Chair, and it is impossible until the vote is taken on those amendments for the friends of the bill to amend it.

It does seem to me that in practice this would be found extremely inconvenient. This is not a matter of any moment so far as this bill is concerned. It is perfectly clear what is to be the fate of this measure, that there is a majority here who will make it what they please, and I think about as good a thing as the friends of the original bill could do would be to give them all the rope they want, and let them run and be glorified. I, for my part, cease to feel any interest whatever in the bill. The majority may make it what they please. They can do it. They can break down every barrier that the experience of the world and the experience of our own country has set up as a good and sound barrier against a deluge of irredeemable paper money. The friends of the Administration, as they are called, may go directly in the teeth of the recommendation of the President in his annual message; they may treat that recommendation with scorn and contempt, as they are doing here by every vote they give. They have the power to do it; and I for one, finding it hopeless to resist them, am content, for my part, to submit to the fate of the vanquished. But, sir, so far as this question of order which is now before the Senate is concerned, it will live long after this bill is disposed of, and return to trouble us in all time; and it seems to me, unless that decision shall be reversed, or if sustained a new rule be made, we shall be in continual trouble.

Mr. SARGENT. The practice of the House of Representatives upon this matter may be of some value as a contemporaneous exposition of parliamentary practice. I have noticed the rulings in the House of Representatives for several years past, and especially in Committee of the Whole, where this question frequently arises upon appropriation bills. There, where a motion is made to strike out a pending paragraph, that motion is never put as long as any other proposition is made to amend the paragraph. The motion to strike out is simply laid aside while some one else moves to amend, and to his motion to amend it is always held in order to submit an amendment; and this is practiced until finally, the paragraph being perfected by those who desire it to be retained in the bill and put in as good shape as they can suggest, then the question to strike out is taken up.

The twelfth rule of the Senate is not new in this particular. If the Chair has looked back he will find that it was first inserted in the rules of the House of Representatives, December 23, 1811, the language there used being that "a motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible." Subsequently in 1822, eleven years thereafter, the remainder of the rule was inserted in the House of Representatives providing that "a motion to strike out being lost shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert." On page 210 of Barclay's Digest the rule is stated in this manner, being a quotation from the forty-sixth rule of the House, which is the same in this particular with the rule of the Senate:

> A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert.

Now, as explaining that rule, follows what I read:

> If it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put for striking it out.

And that is the rule of the House of Representatives. Now, they could not perfect the amendment unless they treat it as they would any other proposition liable to amendment and amendment to amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the Senator read, the text of Barclay's Manual or the rule?

Mr. SARGENT. I read the rule and then the commentary of Barclay. This has been the rule since 1811; and I know that during the last six years it has been the constant practice of the House in Committee of the Whole, where this question arises and where they are not embarrassed by the operation of the previous question, whenever a motion is made to strike out a portion of a bill or a pending paragraph of an appropriation bill, which gives more frequent occasion for such a motion, the friends of the paragraph propose to amend, and that proposition to amend is again amendable. That is the constant practice. I merely state it for whatever value it may have as a contemporary exposition. Having had much to do with appropriation bills in the House, and having watched the rulings and practice on those questions there, I speak with some confidence.

Mr. HOWE. When this question was first raised the other day, I thought I recollected a practice in the Senate that was not in harmony with the ruling of the Chair; and I think still that the practice of the Senate has been different. I rather assumed that the practice of the Senate had been right and that the ruling of the Chair was wrong; but upon my word I cannot see any justification for the practice of the Senate if it has been as I recollected it to be and as Senators about me say they recollect it to have been. If this twelfth rule means anything and says anything, it seems to me to say as explicitly as human language can say that a motion to amend by striking out and inserting is one motion. Well, if it be one motion, then it is subject to only one amendment at a time. Now, I do not understand that the inconvenience can flow from it which the two Senators from Ohio have mentioned. I do not understand how it is possible to force a vote upon the striking out of a bill until you have made the bill as perfect as you can make it. It is true that while there is a motion pending to strike out the bill, here is a motion submitted to perfect the bill by striking out a section. Very well, that is a second amendment, an amendment in the second degree. Now, the Senator from Ohio complains that he cannot on top of that move to amend further by striking out a part of the section, or by striking a part of the section and inserting something else. Suppose that is a practical inconvenience; allow that; and still some other Senator might want to amend the part which the Senator would strike out and perfect that; and you would experience the same difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that that has been always the practice. You move to strike out a section; the section is open to double amendment, in the first degree and in the second degree. That has been the practice, and it is only in that way that you can get at the wish of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator does not understand me, or I do not understand him. If a motion be pending to strike out a section, I understand that it may be amended; or it is in order to move to amend by striking out a part of the section, say by striking out the last half of the section. Does the Senator mean to say that it may be amended by striking out a quarter or a line of the last half?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes; if there is only one amendment.

Mr. HOWE. But there are two. The first motion is to strike out the section. The next motion is to amend that by striking out the last half of the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to strike out is not considered in the light of an amendment at all. When you make a motion to strike out a proposition, that is a substantive proposition just like a motion to lay on the table; and a motion to strike out is not regarded in the light of amendment.

Mr. HOWE. A motion to strike out a section?

Mr. SHERMAN. A motion to strike out a whole section is not in parliamentary practice regarded as an amendment. It is rather a motion to defeat it, like a motion to lay on the table. A motion to strike out a section always subjects the section itself to amendment in the first and second degree.

Mr. HOWE. Is a motion to amend a bill by striking out the first or second section of it not to be treated as a motion to amend?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not a motion to amend the section itself, but a motion to strike it out. It is a motion to amend the bill unquestionably, and the matter to be stricken out is itself open to amendment, and I hesitate myself whether it should be in the first or second degree. I think it should go to the second degree; but that is a question on which I would not be very positive.

Mr. SARGENT. If the pendency of a motion to strike out a section is to be taken as an amendment in the first degree and is to be enforced by the reasoning which we have heard here, then a motion to adopt the bill is pending, and there can be but one subsequent motion upon it. The motion to adopt the bill must be the pending motion, and there can be but two amendments before the Senate. It is just as much a motion, and you can construct an amendment in the third degree upon it, as would be a motion to strike out one-half of the bill or to strike out one section. If it is the mere pendency of a motion that makes it, you have a pending motion all the time to adopt the bill.

Mr. HOWE. But the Senator misunderstands me if he supposes I mean to contend for such a doctrine as that. There are motions to amend, which are limited. The question on the passage of a bill is never treated as a motion to amend. It may be treated as a motion perhaps, but certainly it is not a motion to amend. But a motion to strike out a section of a bill, I always supposed was a motion to amend the bill, and although that motion may be amended, it is subject to but one motion to amend it; but one can be pending at a time.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that he is not arguing the question here? The question here is whether a motion to strike out the whole bill and insert a substitute, is to be considered as an amendment in the first degree, so that when the friends of the bill want to perfect it, and assuming that the Senator from Indiana is a friend of the bill, and in order to perfect it, moves to strike out the fourth section of the bill, that is an amendment in the second degree, and his motion to perfect the bill cannot be amended at all. That is the question. It all results from treating the motion to strike out the whole bill as an amendment of the bill; whereas, I say, to strike out the whole bill and substitute another bill makes two distinct and independent propositions before the Senate, the original bill and the substitute, within the meaning of the rule, which says you shall not go beyond the second degree.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know whether the ten-minute rule applies to this debate or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not, as the Chair thinks.

Mr. HOWE. But I think that was the precise question I was trying to consider. If the twelfth rule does not make that motion to amend, as I said before, it does not make it anything.

Mr. THURMAN. What does the twelfth rule really have to do with it? let me ask the Senator. Suppose the twelfth rule had never been adopted, then a motion to strike out and a motion to insert would have been divisible motions. One person might move to strike out, and another to amend by moving to insert, and they would have been two motions, and then, according to that theory, no other motion could be made. You could not move to perfect the bill at all, because here are two amendments in the second degree, one is to strike out, and the other is to insert.

Mr. HOWE. Then you would have two propositions before the Senate at one time, which the general parliamentary law tolerates, and which this rule does not tolerate.

Mr. THURMAN. How does that rule prevent its being tolerated?

Mr. HOWE. Simply because it consolidates them, and says they shall be but one question.

Mr. THURMAN. How does that affect this question? I really cannot see.

Mr. HOWE. I do not say that I can, but I was so sure that I did see it that I thought I would try and point it out. I shall have to vote to sustain what I believe to be the true construction of these rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will pardon the Chair for making another suggestion on this subject, tending to show that these rules do change and supersede the general parliamentary law. In our edition of Jefferson's Manual, page 255, it is said:

> In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out. If on the question it be retained, it cannot be amended afterward, because a vote against striking it out is equivalent to a vote agreeing to it in that form.

And yet by this Rule 12 it is expressly provided:

> Nor shall the rejection of a motion simply to strike out prevent a subsequent motion to strike out and insert.

In other words, the Chair understands these rules to hold the same relation to general parliamentary law that a statute holds to the common law; and while by the parliamentary law this motion is two motions, so to speak, when it is moved to strike out and insert, two motions are made at once, must be treated separately, and are so treated, and probably may be amended separately; that would be the understanding of the Chair; yet by this rule which says they shall not be divided, it seems that the proposition is made one proposition, and that that is an amendment to the bill in the first degree, after which you can have one amendment at either end of the proposition, either on the bill or on the words to be inserted; and whichever gets the floor first will preclude the other until a vote is had on that. Then a vote can be had on the other proposition; and then the whole subject is open to amendment again when it comes into the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one thing. No one denies that the practice of the Senate under this rule has been so and so. Now is it wise for the Senate, by a deliberate vote, to change that practice? I have heard a great deal of complaint and talk about the previous question. I have always been in favor of the previous question and limiting debate in this body; but this change in the practice of the Senate will be a greater revolution than the introduction of the previous question. It practically ties our hands in the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Now, I beg Senators to remember that no one has taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair. There was a manifest reluctance to do so. The Chair saw at once that even those Senators who differed with the Chair did not wish to express their dissent by taking an appeal. But now, since the Chair has submitted the matter to the judgment of the Senate, I appeal to the Senate whether it is not better for us to settle the practice as it has always been in times past, so as to give the largest latitude for amendment, qualification, and limitation, rather than to tie ourselves down by a rule that will embarrass us hereafter and compel us sometimes to vote on propositions which do not present the real question that we wish to vote upon. We may at the same time pursue this course, although we deny, as the Senator from New York seems to do, the view that the Chair has taken by the literal construction of the rule. It is manifest that the practice of the Senate under that rule has been different. Is it not better for us to follow the old practice rather than set up now a construction that perhaps the great ability of my friend in the Chair as a lawyer has enabled him to see here, and perhaps it is a correct one? At least he thinks so, and many other lawyers here think that it is a correct construction of the rule. Yet it is a departure from the whole practice of the Senate, which I dislike very much to see, especially at this time. Every rule of the Senate which allows the largest liberty, the largest latitude, the greatest facility for amendment and debate, has always been favored here, and I hope that construction will be continued.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this view of the question. We have gone through this bill so far under the ruling, and why not finish the bill under the same ruling? The Senator has made a very pointed case. He has stated that the motion to strike out section 4 precludes the possibility of his making that section conform in the amount of greenbacks to the prior vote of the Senate. Now, this bill is a report from the Committee on Finance, which the chairman has presented. The amendment or the improvement of the bill by striking out this section did not originate with the nominal friends of the bill. The striking out of the section was moved by those who are termed the opponents of the bill. Now, the point is made, and it is made as a case of great inconvenience, that the friends of the bill cannot make it conform to the judgment of the Senate. As I understand it, the turning point of the vote upon striking out this section 4 will be upon the idea of contraction or not. That lies at the basis of the vote, if I may be permitted to anticipate that. It is the contraction of the greenbacks down to $300,000,000 from the $382,000,000. It is non-essential in that regard whether the amount named in the section is $382,000,000 or $400,000,000; that is incidental. The question upon which the Senate will vote will be whether the Senate proposes to provide for the contraction of greenbacks to $300,000,000 or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that my friend will understand me distinctly, that I am trying to present a question that has no connection whatever with this bill, a question of order.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. But the Senator attaches it to the inconvenience of striking out $382,000,000 and inserting $400,000,000, to make the section conform to our previous action. I am not sure that the chairman will vote for that. He has pointed out the fact that the $382,000,000 here is inconsistent with the vote of the Senate in the other section making the amount $400,000,000; but I am not confident that the Senator will vote to change the $382,000,000 to $400,000,000, for he has been against that increase, and it would seem as though he were making a point here merely to magnify the inconvenience while we arrive by it at no essential good. Now, I say, inasmuch as there has been this ruling so far through the bill, is it not more harmonious that we should continue under it and not raise the point now, basing it upon the fact that the majority of the Senate have stricken out $382,000,000 and inserted $400,000,000 in the first section, and now this subsequent section should be made to conform to that former action of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, I will suggest to the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his amendment and let us see if we cannot vote on this question. He can make this point again at some time when there will be no suggestion or fear that it is to influence the pending business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to present the question to the judgment of the Senate whether they wish to follow the old practice of the Senate, without any question at all with reference to the finances. We can certainly settle the whole question of order now without committing ourselves for or against the idea of inflation.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope the Senator will bring it up at some other time.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have risen to add my voice to that of the Senator from California, and to implore the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his amendment, and if my friend from Michigan will permit me for one minute I will state my reasons. The Senate to-day will sustain the decision of the Chair upon what has no connection with the ruling of the Chair, in my judgment. If it does it will be a precedent that will rise up here to vex us in all our subsequent legislation. It will reverse the practice of this body for thirty long years. It is not of the slightest importance in this question what is the ruling of the Chair or what is not; the friends of the motion submitted by the Senator from Indiana have got a fixed majority here; they can strike out what they please; they can insert what they please; and there is nothing in the world to be gained by the ruling of the Chair, and if the Chair under this state of excitement is to be sustained it will establish a precedent that will vex us in other legislation. Who does not know that upon every principal measure we have at the last end finally settled it by somebody offering a substitute, and who does not know that the substitute and the original bill have been treated as two distinct propositions, although I know the rule says that when you put a question you shall not divide it when you put it, and that is all there is of the rule? If we are to establish it so that we cannot perfect, first, the substitute, and secondly, the original proposition, it will, I repeat, again come up to vex us all; and I do hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion. I desire to add that the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Indiana both urged me the other day to maintain the position that I am now maintaining, and they are against me now. I do ask the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his motion.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am sustaining the ruling of the Chair, and I am here to maintain the consistency of this body upon the question of ruling, and I say to the Senator from Ohio that a simple vote upon the section will settle the question of harmony and consistency between these sections and the prior action of the Senate. If it is carried, it wipes out this $382,000,000 and wipes out the contraction. If it is rejected, then the Senator can move his amendment, as I hope he will, to strike out "$382,000,000" and insert "$400,000,000." I am not sure that the Senator will vote for it, because he has not done so heretofore; but there will be an opportunity for him to do so if we fail to strike out this section. It seems to me, however, as though we had arrived at that point where the simplest, quickest, easiest way is to take a vote on the section and thus settle the question of contraction and the question of consistency between the sections.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to say a word in reply to my friend from Maine. On Friday last I made a motion to strike out the second section. It was decided by the Chair not to be in order because of the amendment pending offered by the Senator from Illinois to the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina. I had an impression that it was in order, and I so said to my friend from Maine; but it was held that it was not in order. That seemed to be the final conclusion of the Chair and I thought of a large part of the Senate. Hence to-day when the motion of the Senator from Maine himself to change the form of the second section was made I asked the question whether that was in order. I have simply that much to say in regard to it.

And now, Mr. President, one word in response to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I was particularly struck with his remarks a few minutes ago. He declared that he took no further interest in this bill. His resignation was very touching indeed; but what surprised me most was his tender regard for the recommendation of the President of the United States on the question of the currency. Of course I was gratified at that because it was something new; but at the same time it would be very hard for him to find in any message of the President the particular recommendation to which he referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am surprised to hear that Senators are so excited that they will reverse the established rules of the Senate in order to carry out a particular scheme. I have a very sad view of the measure that is being adopted to-day. I believe that we are dishonoring the public faith, dishonoring the promises of the nation, dishonoring the promises of the republican party as claimed at the outset of the administration of President Grant; and I have said so frankly, but I did not think there was such a sentiment, such excitement, in this Senate Chamber as that Senators would deem it necessary, in doing what I regard as an almost criminal violation of the public faith, to overrule the established rules and precedents of the Senate. I have had no feeling about this matter. I have been out-voted, but I certainly have not made any threats about it. I simply wish to preserve the rules of the Senate, not for this particular case, because I concede myself that what are called the inflationists are in the majority, and they can pass the bill as they choose. They can issue a thousand millions of bank-notes without redemption, or any qualification whatever. They might as well go beyond the $400,000,000 and make it $5,000,000,000. That they could do; they have the power to do it; there is no doubt about that; but is it necessary in doing that to reverse the established rules of the Senate? My honorable friend from Maine says the Senate is in such a condition that it will reverse the old established usages of the body, and change the form and manner of doing business. We certainly are not in such a state of intellectual excitement as that.

The Chair has found a construction of the rule, and according to the grammatical construction he thinks he is correct; but it is contrary to the usages of the Senate, and our rules have been rather matters of usage and custom. Like the old common law, they are customs rather than written law. We very seldom refer to the rules except in very elementary propositions. We depend upon the customs of the Senate and rely upon them. Here is a custom which has opened wide the latitude of debate and given every Senator the freest opportunity to express his opinion, to approve and debate any measure, and perfect it, in the language of parliamentary law, before it is proposed to be stricken out. Now it is proposed to reverse that rule in the midst of a debate, pending a bill of great public importance. It seems to me that while this measure is bad enough, it may be made still worse if this debate and the action of the Senate to-day are to be made the occasion of reversing the established usages and customs of the body. I trust we are not so excited but that we can settle this question properly at the present time.

I have always noticed in the Senate, and it is with great propriety too, that it is with extreme reluctance the Senate will ever overrule a decision of the Chair; it is very rarely done. Now, it is not necessary to do that. The Chair himself having given his construction of this rule, submits it to us, and the question is with us. Had we better take the construction of the rule which the Chair puts upon it, or had we better conform our action in this particular case to the customs of the Senate? As a matter of course, in regard to this particular proposition, I only seize on a case that is pending before us, a strong case. Here is a section that the Senator from Indiana desires to strike out; he moves to strike it out, and yet I cannot amend that section so as to conform it to the previous vote of the Senate upon his own motion, or the motion of some one of those with whom he is acting; and there is the embarrassment of the case. It is only an illustration of what might occur every day in the year, especially pending an appropriation bill.

Now, I trust that by a unanimous vote, especially after the declaration made by the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Maine, and other Senators who have been here a number of years, that it has always been the practice of the Senate to regard a motion to strike out rather in the light of a motion to lay on the table, and to regard the section proposed to be stricken out as always open to amendment in the first and second degree, I trust we shall conform to that practice, and simply declare that it is our purpose to conform to it; and fortunately we can do it now without overruling the Chair, or having any effect upon the question of inflation. My friend from Michigan can have all the paper money he wants without overruling this established practice of the Senate. He can frame his bill to expand the currency as much as those who are voting in harmony with him choose; but it is not necessary to go further than that in order to accomplish it, and reverse the rules and usages of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, at the last meeting of the Senate, when my proposition was offered, the question, as I understood it then, was whether, on an amendment to a substitute, a motion to strike out a portion of the original bill was in order. The Chair decided that it was not; and as I understood the Chair, he decided then as he has decided now. I withdrew my proposition, so as to allow the Senator from Indiana to move to strike out a portion of the original bill, with the understanding that if the motion failed, then the section would be subject to amendment, which is the decision and ruling to-day. There is no difference, no change whatever. It was acquiesced in then, and looked upon as correct, because the discussion showed then that the motion of the Senator from Indiana was not correct at the time, or was out of order at least, unless my motion was withdrawn, which was done for that purpose. Now, I do not see any inconvenience in that, or any impropriety in it; nor do I see any misconstruction of the rule. I think the construction of the rule given by the President of the Senate to-day is the true one. I may be in error, but that is my judgment about it.

But I hope I may be allowed a moment to reply to what has been said. At one time it was thought doubtful as to who had a majority here on this subject, and I do not say anything about a majority now except so far as the votes have gone. I know nothing as to what the result may be, but it seems to me very strange that Senators should become suddenly so very much alarmed that the country is going to be injured, the country is going to be ruined, there is going to be a great flood of greenbacks and paper money rained down by the action of the Senate upon the heads of the people of the United States to such an extent that everything will be depreciated and destroyed! Does not the Senator from Ohio know that other Senators here have as much interest in the welfare of this country as he has himself? Does he presume that Senators here who may be in the majority have not the interests of their own constituents at heart as much as he has? Does he suppose that we, if we should have a majority, would wield our power in such a manner as to destroy this Republic or the interests of the people? If he does, it only proves a want of confidence in that Senator's mind in the majority of the Senate of the United States.

I have always taken it for granted that at least Senators knew what they were doing, at least they knew upon what line they were acting. If the majority of the Senate to the end stand as they do now, and that majority shall fail to give the country something that is a relief and something that is not calculated to destroy in its effects, then the criticism of the Senator might be correct; but until they show a want of capacity to perform their duty in this Chamber to their constituents, and in such a manner as will benefit them, they are not subject to any such criticism.

Inflation! The Senator says we may have $5,000,000,000. Who has talked about $5,000,000,000? The word "inflation" is used as a kind of bugbear. Let us change the term. Suppose that we who have proved ourselves faithful, as we think, to the interests of our country and were in a majority in this body in regard to this issue of $400,000,000, change the term; suppose instead of calling us inflationists we call you contractionists and extortionists, how would you like that? You would not like it; you would say no. Suppose we say that you are trying to contract the currency down to such a point as to allow the banks to practice extortion upon the people of this country, you would become enraged at it. You would say we were making insinuations here against you. We mean no such thing. We have submitted all the time to these attacks upon us denouncing us as inflationists. We have not used opprobrious terms toward Senators opposing our theories; but I have just as good a right to say that Senators here who try to contract the currency according to the fourth section down to $300,000,000 are extortionists as they have to say that I am an inflationist.

I am in favor of an increase of the currency up to the business wants of the people of this country. I have given my reasons for it frequently on this floor. I believe that free banking is the best thing to be done; that if banking as it has been carried on has been good for the country, free banking would be better. Cut the restriction down and give the people equal rights in this land—that sacred principle which has been advocated by many men on this floor and by the whole country has been indorsed. That, sir, is what we desire, or I know some of us do at least. We propose to extend equal rights to the people of this land in business matters as well as in other matters; and while we are fighting for the rights of the people, while we are trying to give to them the same rights the law now gives to a few, we are not to be spoken of derisively and contemptuously in this Chamber. No, sir; when we throw down the gauntlet of free banking in this Chamber we throw down the platform of the people of this land, and one, too, that we had as well stand on now as to come to it hereafter. Now is the time, and you might just as well get upon that platform now as to get upon it in the future, because you are sure to be on it, for it is the will of the people of this country, it is the desire of the people of this country; it is the right of the people to have it; it is equality; it is justice; it is that which ought to be the law of this country. Every law ought to have the principle of equality in it. That is all there is in this measure.

One word in reference to this section. The Senator from Ohio appeals to us as though the country would be ruined; why there will be a terrible flood here perhaps in a short time if this section is stricken out. What is this section? This section provides that for every hundred million of national-bank currency that is furnished to be issued, $70,000,000 of greenbacks shall be withdrawn from circulation; in other words, when we think we have got a hundred million of national-bank currency we have got but $30,000,000. That is the provision of the section. What further, sir? Why, that this contraction shall go on until the greenbacks of this country are contracted down to $300,000,000; showing that this bill when reported from the committee, although it professed to give $382,000,000 circulation of greenbacks, yet had the sting in the last section which was to deprive it of its efficacy and of its virtue by the contraction of a hundred millions, which brought it down lower than even the bill by some fifty millions by contraction. It shows the whole scheme, and when you speak of a scheme on our part, I say this scheme as reported here is a scheme of contraction of the currency of the United States, and from one end of it to the other it carries contraction upon its face. And yet we are told that it contains the principle that is to save the people of this land; and Senators, too, who profess, some of them, not to be in favor of contraction, are angry if we propose to strike out the very section that does contract the currency beyond the argument of any man that has been made on this floor so far. Certainly it is a system of contraction and nothing else.

Speaking for myself, I can say in a few words what I am in favor of. I am in favor, first, of standing by the $400,000,000. I am in favor of free banking. This free banking means to give the same right to one association that another has under the law. If the majority of the Senate desire to put clamps upon it so as to restrict it, that is for the majority to say; but the principle is what I am after; and that is why I have introduced it. If they desire to add to that amendments which will make the notes convertible and reconvertible into a small interest-bearing bond, the majority have a right to do that. If they desire to add that a portion of the interest shall be held as a reserve in the bank for redemption purposes, so that when the Government is ready to redeem, the banks may be on an equality at the same time, let that be done; but the principle is right; and that principle will be maintained by this country, if not now, in the future. This is what I desire; and this is what I am working for, and what I am moving in the direction of.

If Senators think this is opening the flood-gates to destroy the country, they have a right to vote against it; but they have no right to criticise my vote when I vote for it. Then, sir, I am in favor of striking out this section; so that the theory upon which we started for an increase of the currency shall be carried out, with proper guards and proper brakes thrown around it, so as to preserve the benefits that will be derived from this general proposition.

WISCONSIN CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. SAWYER. The morning hour having expired, I move to suspend the rules to allow the Committee on the Public Lands to report back Senate bill No. 512, granting an extension of time for the completion of the Wisconsin Central Railroad, to the House, for consideration after the special orders now before the House, and that it shall hold its place on Monday until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear what that is.

Mr. SAWYER. Let me make a brief statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SAWYER. But hear the facts.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, and demand the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I understand that the gentleman who has charge of the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce yields to me for a bill which I desire to have put upon its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to anything out of the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient until the gentleman indicates the withdrawal of his call for the regular order. It is not for one gentleman to indicate the withdrawal by another gentleman.

Some time subsequently, during the reading of the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce,

Mr. RANDALL said: If I have the privilege of withdrawing my objection to the bill of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] I do so; but I object to land grants.

The SPEAKER. The House is now executing its special order.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Commerce, in pursuance of the authority given by the House, assigning such report as a special order for to-day, after the morning hour, reported back the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the appropriations made by the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the payment of the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, are hereby continued in full force, and are made permanently applicable to the payment of the debts of the said Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and so much as may be necessary shall be applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues, and the principal of the outstanding bonds of said company as they mature: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase and pay for any of said bonds, at their market price, not above par, whenever he deems it for the interest of the United States.

SEC. 2. That after thirty days from the passage of this act the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to take possession of the said Louisville and Portland Canal, and all the property, real and personal, of said company, as the property of the United States, as provided for by the act of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, approved February 22, 1844, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company,' approved January 21, 1842," conceding jurisdiction over said canal to the United States, subject, however, to the mortgage lien on said property in favor of the trustees under said mortgage and the holders of the bonds issued under it; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay the directors of said company for the stock held by them, which payment shall be made forthwith by the Secretary of the Treasury, being the sum of $100 to each director, with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum since the 9th day of February, 1864; and he is authorized and directed to cause a careful and full examination of all receipts and disbursements of the said company to be made, and to collect, and, if necessary, to sue for any money due to or held for the said company by the directors of said company, or the trustees under said mortgage, or by any person whatever. And said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and empowered, immediately upon the passage of this act, to give public notice, in such manner as, in his judgment, will best effect the purpose, to all persons and corporations having debts of any nature against said Louisville and Portland Canal Company, except the bonded debt thereof, to present them to him on or before the 1st day of July, 1875; and any such debt not presented on or before said day shall be forever barred. And said Secretary is hereby directed and authorized to examine, audit, and, in his discretion, allow such debts, or any of them, being hereby vested with any power necessary to that end; and he shall embrace this action in the premises in his succeeding annual report: Provided, however, That no sum of money shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury on account of any claim for either city or State taxes assessed, or to be hereafter assessed, against said company, or against the said canal property, or any of its appendages; and no money shall be paid under the provisions of this act until all claims for said taxes shall have been released.

SEC. 3. That the said canal and property appertaining thereto shall be held for the common use and benefit of the people of the United States, free of all tolls and charges, except such as are necessary to pay the current expenses of said canal, and to keep the same in repair; and for the present year they shall be at the rate of ten cents per ton capacity on vessels propelled by steam, and five cents per ton on other vessels; and to ascertain what rates will pay current expenses after the present year, the Secretary of War shall, on the first Monday of January of each year, ascertain from the expenditures of the previous year what tolls will probably pay the expenses of the current year; and he shall fix and declare the rate of tolls thus ascertained to be charged for the current year; and, until otherwise provided by law, the Secretary of War shall provide for the superintendence, management, and repair of said canal, and may apply the tolls so received, as far as may be necessary, to pay the current expenses of said canal; and he shall, in his next annual report, set forth such receipts and expenditures, and the condition of said canal, with a view to such legislation as may be necessary for the superintendence and management thereof.

Mr. WHEELER. As an individual member of the committee, I offer what I send to the desk to be read, as an amendment to be regarded as pending to the substitute.

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

Provided further, That said Secretary shall pay no money under any of the provisions of this act, nor shall the Secretary of War take possession of said canal as authorized by the next section, until the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax, or in any way to assess, said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

Mr. WHEELER. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] to be resumed by me at his pleasure, or on the indication of a majority, for the purpose of demanding the previous question upon the bill and pending amendment, reserving to myself the closing hour for debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BANNING. I send to the desk to be read resolutions of the Board of Trade of Cincinnati, received by me this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of the Board of Trade of Cincinnati, held on Saturday, March 28, 1874, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas Congress at its last session passed an act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to "assume, on behalf of the United States," the control and management of the Louisville and Portland Canal, and providing for a large reduction of the onerous tolls paid by vessels navigating the Ohio River; and whereas from some cause the Secretary of the Treasury has failed to put in operation this provision of this law, and the said onerous and burdensome tolls are still charged on our commerce: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Cincinnati Board of Trade, representing the manufacturing and commercial interests of our city, again appeals to Congress to enact such laws as shall speedily and effectually relieve the commerce of the Ohio River, in which the Western and Southern States are so deeply interested, of this most unjust and unreasonable tax, and place the canal in the hands of the Government, with authority to charge a rate of tolls which shall not be in excess of the cost of operating and maintaining the work.

Resolved, That this board earnestly appeals to members of Congress from the Western and Southern States, and especially to the members from Ohio, to see that this act of justice is rendered the commerce of the Ohio River, by appropriate and immediate legislation.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this 28th day of March, A. D. 1874.

H. H. TATEM,
Secretary.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, the Louisville and Portland Canal was incorporated by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky in 1825. It was built to enable vessels navigating the Ohio River to pass an obstruction opposite Louisville, known as the Falls.

The original capital stock of the company was $600,000, divided into shares of $100 each. The United States subscribed for one thousand shares, at a cost of $100,000. The stock was afterward increased to $1,000,000, divided into ten thousand shares of $100 each.

By authority of the acts of Congress and of the Legislature of Kentucky, the dividends belonging to the United States were applied to the purchase of the shares of private individuals.

In 1855 the United States had become the owner of all the canal stock except five shares, which were retained by the five directors of the company at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, until provision was made by Congress for taking possession and charge of the canal.

In 1869 the board of directors of the company made a loan of $1,600,000 for the enlargement of the canal and locks. This amount was not sufficient to finish the work. Congress then appropriated the amount of money necessary, and, under charge of General Weitzel, of the Engineer Corps, United States Army, the improvement has been completed.

In his able report General Weitzel, in speaking of the canal and its cost to the Government, gives the list of tolls collected since it went into operation, in 1831, to 1872, when it was closed for repairs, the total amount being $5,157,247.05. In his report General Weitzel then says:

Now, if the Government pays or assumes the debt of the canal, and makes the appropriation asked for to complete the work, the whole amount that the Louisville and Portland Canal will have cost is barely one-half of this enormous sum, $5,157,247.05, taken out of the pockets of the people of the country to get round an obstruction in a national highway.

Besides, it will be a very cheap price to pay for this work and the grounds belonging to it, when they, as real estate alone, are worth at least the amount which the Government is asked to pay for them.

The expense of operating the canal has been greater during the progress of the work of enlargement than it will be when everything is completed and working smoothly.

I think that with both sets of locks the canal can be operated at an expense of $50,000, and probably less, if the crews of vessels passing throughout will assist, as they undoubtedly will gladly do, when the toll is only nominal.

Now, the new locks and enlarged canal were first thrown open to the public on the 6th of February, 1872.

The receipts of toll from the 1st of January, 1872, to that time were very light, as navigation was almost continually suspended by ice, yet from that date to August 23, 1872, (when the canal was closed for repairs,) that is, in a period of about six months, $207,025.19 were collected for tolls. This sum is $26,099.79 greater than the greatest amount of toll collected in any one year (1866) previous. It is perfectly safe, I think, to assume that during the next year, if the rate of toll were continued at fifty cents per ton, the tolls collected would reach $350,000. If this be true, the rate of tolls should be fixed at about seven cents, when the canal comes into the control of the Government, in order just to pay running expenses.

But accidents are liable to happen, and frequently do happen, to gates and machinery, and a fund of $50,000 to enable damages to be promptly repaired should be accumulated as soon as possible, and always maintained. For, in case of any such accident, the work of repair could not be delayed to await an appropriation from Congress.

For this reason I think it would be the part of wisdom to fix the rate of tolls during the first year at about twelve cents per ton. The experience gained during this year would enable the toll to be fixed during succeeding years. I believe that the increase in the tonnage which will pass through the canal when the toll is decreased will enable the rate to be fixed as low as five cents per ton after the first year.

In framing the act for accepting the canal, I think that the Secretary of the Treasury, by whose Department the canal would of course be operated, should have the power to fix the toll from time to time, so as just to pay the running expenses and keep a fund of about $50,000 on hand for repairs. He should also be authorized to employ the persons necessary to operate the canal, and fix their pay. The persons should all be employed during good behavior, for it will work serious if not fatal injury to the best interests of commerce if experienced men are not continually employed on the work, especially in opening and closing these enormous gates.

The following are the rates of toll at present charged:

Fifty cents per ton on steamboats and all other vessels aving hcustom-house papers.

Three cents per superficial foot on produce flats, barges, &c.

Two cents per superficial foot on flats, barges, &c., carrying coal, salt, iron, hay, lime, lumber, stone, brick, wood, sand, &c.

One cent per superficial foot on empty flats, barges, rafts, &c., not having custom-house papers.

In reducing the rate of toll for steamboats the rates for the other crafts should be proportionately reduced.

The report, which can be found in full in Executive Document No. 1, Forty-second Congress, third session, together with the report of the secretary of the company, contains a full and complete history of the canal and the strongest reasons for the passage of this bill. It shows conclusively that the tolls may be reduced more than four-fifths, and then the collections will be more than sufficient to pay the expenses of the canal. It recommends the passage of such a bill as we now have under consideration, leaving the fixing of the amount of toll to the Secretary, so that he may adjust the same to pay the expenses of the canal.

This recommendation of General Weitzel is founded upon the statute of Kentucky of 1842, which provides that—

When the said shares shall be purchased the same shall be all transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair.

That the canal is a matter of national character, of greatest interest, perhaps, to the people of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, the West and the South, but of great interest to the people of the entire country, is well shown by the report of the Committee on Commerce made to this House in February last.

In speaking of the Ohio River improvement, they say:

As an avenue for the cheap transmission and distribution of the fabrics of the East, fuel, cereals, and other products of the West, the Ohio River stands pre-eminent.

Through a remarkable combination of physical circumstances this channel presents geographical and commercial advantages so eminently conducive to the prosperity and wealth of the whole country as to make its improvement a question of sweeping nationality.

It is a material part of the grand system of continuous water transit from the head-waters of the Monongahela and Alleghany Rivers to the Gulf of Mexico, and the main thoroughfare for the proposed canals through the interior of Virginia, traversing the great Apalachian coal-field, and almost boundless deposits of iron, to Hampton Roads on the sea, and, via the Tennessee, Coosa, and Ocmulgee Rivers, threading the rich mineral and cotton districts of Georgia to the harbor of Altamaha Sound on the Atlantic Ocean.

The navigation of the Ohio directly influences the industries of fourteen of the States, but circulates the commodities of every State in the Union. It belongs to the Government of the United States. It is a national highway, governed by national authority. It promotes very many national interests by facilitating intercourse, aids commerce, contributes to the operations of war, enhances the resources of the nation, develops the producing agencies of every branch of trade, and exchanges the gifts of nature for those of the arts and sciences.

It is therefore the duty of Congress to consider the means requisite to add to the efficiency and importance of this channel.

The people of Cincinnati, a portion of whom I have the honor to represent, are largely interested in the passage of this bill. The present high tolls are a heavy tax upon our commerce. We think the navigation of this great national highway should be made free to us, and to all, at least as near free as this bill makes it.

The Government should not charge us for the privileges of this canal more than the expenses of operating it.

We think we deserve well of the national Government; we do right well our part in keeping up the national revenues and paying the national expense. During the fiscal year ending July 1, 1873, Cincinnati paid $7,161,277.20 internal revenue, and since 1863 to July 1, 1873, we have paid $69,786,307.37 internal revenue into the national Treasury toward paying the debt and expenses of this Government.

Shall the manufactured products of our city, which pay this immense revenue to the Government, be tolled again for the benefit of the United States as it passes the Louisville Canal on its way to market? Is it in keeping with the spirit of our Government to compel commerce to pay tonnage duties for the privilege of navigating our river?

In the report of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati for 1872, the first report of that board after the completion of the canal, in speaking of its enlargement, the board say:

Boats of large class, so long as they can navigate the remainder of the river, will find no obstacle at Louisville. Encouragement will thus be given for the establishment of lines of the best and largest boats, and to the building of steamers for our trade as commodious as the ambition of boat-owners may prompt. In fact this result has already been anticipated by the building of boats of large capacity for our lower-river trade. It is true an onerous burden is yet imposed on our commerce by the tonnage duties at the canal, but the hope that the Government will take such action as will actually secure merely nominal tolls certainly will not be disappointed.

The same board, in their annual report for 1873, say:

The river interest, during the past year, has in some important respects presented a more favorable aspect than during the preceding, or perhaps a number of preceding years. The completion of the Louisville and Portland Canal, noticed in the last report, has had a most salutary effect. A larger class of boats has visited Cincinnati than ever before, save during the most favorable stages of the river, and it has secured to commerce, during much of the time, lower freights both by river and by railroad to points below, thus not only reducing the cost of transportation on the usual commerce of the city, but also increasing our trade. The beneficial results have been quite apparent; still they have not been so marked as they would have been had there been the reduction in tolls which was contemplated by the recent act of Congress. And even this reduction would not have brought full benefit; for, until there shall be such changes as shall secure nominal tolls, the charges paid will be a tax on the commerce of Cincinnati, and the full measure of relief contemplated by this great national improvement will be so far postponed.

Mr. Speaker, the city of Louisville did assert her right to tax this canal property, and commenced a suit to collect the taxes. Whether the city of Louisville, tired of and wearied with the procrastination of the General Government to take possession of the canal and reduce the tolls and relieve the commerce of this river, commenced this suit to compel some action on the part of the General Government, I do not know; I am, however, advised that since the bill has been pending the authorities of the city of Louisville have dismissed this suit.

The canal is now the property of the United States, except five shares of $100 each, which are held by individuals, as I have before stated. It is the property of the Government—bought by the Government, and paid for by the Government. Has the State a right to levy a tax upon property of this character, belonging to the General Government? If so, when did she acquire it? When did a State before assert such a right; and how does it come that the city of Louisville has slept upon this right for nearly half a century, and now only asserts it at a time when the commerce of this great river is to be relieved of these onerous tolls, levied for the privilege of this canal?

Surely, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this objection worthy of argument, or deserving the consideration of this House.

Upon this subject, after giving extracts from laws of Kentucky, the committee say:

It would seem, from the foregoing authorities, that, as the property of the canal company is represented by the shares of stock, and these shares are owned by the United States, the property is not subject to taxation under the authority of the State of Kentucky.

Sir, it has been argued against this bill that the Campbell heirs have asserted, or are going to assert, some right to a title in this property, dating back to the days before Kentucky was a State. This question has been carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce in their report. They find that the claim of the Campbell heirs is without foundation. I only mention it now to say that these two objections are of about equal strength.

I hope the House will pass this bill now. I fear if we delay its passage, some sharp speculator may hunt up some descendant of the old Indian chief, whose favorite resort was near the falls of the Ohio on account of the good fishing and fine hunting there, and set up for him that his forefather was never sufficiently remunerated, and claim title to this property because his scalping ancestor got only one tin whistle instead of two, as in the treaty provided.

Mr. Speaker, if these claims against the canal property were valid, as they are not; if Louisville had the right to tax; and the Campbell heirs a title therein, as they have not, would it be an argument against the passage of this bill?

Who should pay the tax and who should settle with the Campbell heirs—the commerce of this river or the Government of the United States? This question admits of but one answer, which is that the Government that improves and protects the harbors and builds lighthouses upon the sea-coast ought equally to secure the safe and free navigation of western rivers.

It will be claimed against the passage of this bill that the surrender of jurisdiction is not full and complete. The bill as now amended is certainly well guarded in that respect. Reported as it is from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] it comes to this House well recommended, announcing in its favorable report from that gentleman that it has been most thoroughly considered, and that all the rights of the Government have been carefully and well taken care of.

JURISDICTION.

On the 21st of January, 1842, the General Assembly of Kentucky passed the following amendment to the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal:

That in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States, and no annual report, as mentionnd in the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal, shall be required to be made by the United States or the agents and superintendents of said canal to the General Assembly of this Commonwealth.

On the 28th of March, 1872, the Legislature of Kentucky passed the following joint resolution:

Whereas all the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government except five shares owned by the directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and said directors, under the authority of the legislation of Kentucky and the United States, executed a mortgage to Isaac Caldwell and Dean Richmond to secure bonds named in said mortgage, some of which are out and unpaid, and said canal company may owe other debts; and whereas it is right and proper that the Government of the United States should assume the control and management of said canal: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Kentucky, That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company are hereby authorized and directed to surrender the said canal, and all the property connected therewith, to the Government of the United States, upon the following terms and conditions:

1. That the Government of the United States shall not levy tolls on said canal, except such as shall be necessary to keep the same in repair, pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements.

2. That the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper: Provided always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal, and so constructed as not to interfere with its navigation.

t 3. That the title and possession of the United States of said canal shall not interfere with the right of the State to serve criminal and civil processes, or with the State's general police power over the territory covered by the said canal and its appendages.

4. And further, that the city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal: Provided, That the connections between the drains and the canal shall be made upon the plan to keep out mud and garbage.

5. That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the actual owners of the property contiguous to said canal, its branches, and dams, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Department of the United States Government which may have charge of the said canal.

6. That the Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

The Legislature of Kentucky has adjourned and will not be in session again for two years. The money necessary to carry this measure into operation is already appropriated. A delay will work to the advantage of no person except the five directors of the company, while the passage of this bill will relieve the commerce of the Ohio River of a tonnage duty of more than $350,000 annually, and will enable the people of the East to get the cotton, the rice, the corn, the tobacco, the wheat, and other products of the South and West free of this most unreasonable and unjust tax.

I desire in conclusion to submit the following letter of the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati:

CINCINNATI, March 19, 1874.

DEAR SIR: As I promised you, I respectfully present the following memoranda, in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal:

The steamer Thompson Dean left Cincinnati on Sunday, March 8, 1874, for New Orleans. With other cargo, she took barrel pork at thirty-four cents per barrel, in round numbers at two dollars per ton. It costs her one dollar per ton to pass through the Louisville and Portland Canal, going from Cincinnati to New Orleans, and returning boats are charged by their tonnage, without regard to the cargo they may have on board. They pay the full toll, though they may not have a ton of cargo on board.

Coal can be transported from Pittsburgh to New Orleans at about one dollar per ton; canal tolls on a steamboat going and returning are equal to the entire cost of taking coal from Pittsburgh to New Orleans in barges.

Steamboats can easily make the voyage from Cincinnati to Saint Louis, or to Memphis and return in two weeks. A boat measuring six hundred tons and making such trips, if she always passed through the canal, would pay $300 per week canal tolls.

It is very safe to say that a packet plying regularly between Cincinnati and Saint Louis, or between Cincinnati and Memphis, would during her life-time pay as much money for tolls as it cost to build and furnish the boat.

A packet line between Cincinnati and Saint Louis was recently projected. The advantages of such a line to the valleys along all the western rivers would be of very great value. Since my arrival here I have heard that the project has been abandoned, because the tolls at the canal would exhaust all the profits expected to be derived from the establishment of the lines.

There are about three hundred thousand tons of iron-ore to be transported from the banks of the Mississippi below Saint Louis to the coal-fields of the Upper Ohio during the current year. As the water on the Falls of the Ohio is less for ascending than descending boats almost the entire year, a large proportion of this iron will have to pass through the canal, thus adding fifty cents to its cost of transportation.

Facts like these could be furnished you from almost every department of trade.

Yours truly,

S. F. COVINGTON.

General BANNING.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] resumes his seat, I wish to ask him a question about the rate of tolls. What are they now on the commerce by steamers?

Mr. BANNING. Fifty cents a ton.

Mr. KASSON. The bill of last Congress provided for reducing them to not exceeding twenty-five cents.

Mr. HOLMAN. The object of this bill is to carry that into effect.

Mr. KASSON. This bill, on the contrary, provides for reducing them to ten cents; and I would like some gentleman to explain the reason for that reduction, and whether that reduced rate will be enough to meet the expenses of the canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will indulge us a little, he will find these points made clear.

I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANDIFORD.]

Mr. STANDIFORD. Mr. Speaker, in considering this bill and its provisions, and the relief which it contemplates to a class of commerce which has hitherto been legislated nearly out of existence, and also in respect to its bearing upon and importance to the great, populous, and wealthy valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi, and the States immediately interested in this matter, and also in respect to its bearing upon the financial policy of the country, it comes to us as one of no minor importance, and should command the careful attention of every member of this House; and I cannot think that the House will refuse to pass the bill when it fully understands the conditions upon which these people ask it of this Congress, and how this Government is bound by every moral obligation that would be considered binding upon an individual to take possession of the Louisville and Portland Canal in the interest of the commerce which occupies this great national highway.

The territory interested directly in the navigation of this river, embracing an area containing more than three hundred thousand square miles and several thousand miles of river navigation, and fully one-fourth of the population of the United States, is, I believe, richer in all that gratifies the wants of man than any other country in the civilized world, with its genial and healthful climate, its varied productions diversified in its great agricultural and mineral wealth—Pennsylvania with her inexhaustible fields of coal, iron, and oil; Ohio and West Virginia with lumber, salt, oil, coal, grain, and hay; Illinois and Indiana with their golden fields of corn, oats, wheat, and barley; Kentucky, Missouri, and Tennessee with hemp, tobacco, grain, and iron; and with all these States producing fine horses, cattle, and hogs in surplus quantities sufficient to supply Germany, Ireland, France, and England with food; and the Southern States with cotton, sugar, rice, and tropical fruits, with ample capacity for maintaining a population equal to Europe. Well may the Ohio Valley be called the land of milk and honey.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that the bill now under discussion is one to which your attention has been heretofore directed, and upon the importance of the measure many of the members of the House are far better informed than myself, and I therefore trust are predisposed to look with indulgence upon my inability to discuss this question in all its bearings. I believe no measure before Congress has absorbed the attention of the people more than cheap transportation, unless it be the finances of the country.

I know that if a careful examination be made it will be found that the portion of country interested in the navigation of this river pays fully two-thirds of the internal revenue of the country. My own State alone paid $5,456,678.47 last year, which exceeds the annual internal-revenue tax of the States of Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Vermont combined, by more than $200,000. And just here I wish to say, that while legislation has been conducted in the interest of an equal reduction of taxation, and members have deluded themselves into the belief that great advancement has been made in that direction, a few facts will show how such legislation has affected the East and the West respectively. By the last act which came to be a law, Massachusetts was relieved from taxation about 50 per cent., or more than two and a half million dollars, while the effect was to increase the burden upon the people of the Ohio Valley; as for instance in 1872, Illinois paid $15,799,667.30, and in 1873 she paid $16,493,169.34; Indiana paid, in 1872, $5,441,892.72, and in 1873, $5,678,052.51, showing an increase in these States. Virginia's tax was increased more than $3,000,000, while Ohio, which pays one-seventh of the internal revenue of the nation, was relieved by this bill only $50,000.

Sir, all this kind of legislation has been in favor of the East against the West, and now when we come and ask so small a favor as this, we are met by opposition from gentlemen whose debts and taxes we have been so long furnishing the money to pay. Why, the fact of the matter is that the States bordering upon this river, I mean Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, to say nothing of Pennsylvania and West Virginia, pay annually over $42,000,000 out of the $106,000,000 internal-revenue tax collected in the country.

We know that the Government has lent its credit to the enormous sum of $64,000,000, and given millions of acres of land to capitalists to extend the iron horse to the Pacific coast, containing a population of less than one million. Upon this debt the Ohio Valley has been paying the interest, which now exceeds $20,000,000, in the proportion, as I have just shown, of 42 to 106, or twenty-one fifty-thirds of the whole amount. While we agree that we have been benefited by this great national outlay, the East has received treble benefits, and we have paid the expense of the improvement.

We have heard of the discontent of the grangers; they are consulting, and will finally discover the cause of all their troubles, and, like the intelligent physician when called to see his patient, will carefully diagnose the case, find the cause of the complaint, then apply the physic to aid nature to throw off the disease and restore the sick to health. Need I say that the trouble under which they are laboring is this system of unequal taxation? They will find that the railroads are not altogether in fault in producing their troubles, but that the legislation of the country in the interest of eastern monopolies, causing inordinate expenses, compels exorbitant rates.

We ask the Government to take possession of property already its own and protect our commerce from the burden of this tax. What I refer to is this. The tax on the commerce of the Ohio River, by reason of the tolls exacted by the United States, amount to a large prohibition of trade. The smaller classes of boats built for navigating the tributaries of the Ohio cannot afford to pay the tax upon their freight and tonnage in passing through this canal. To illustrate, (and I wish you, sir, and the members of this House to understand that I am not taking any extreme cases, but endeavoring in an honest business way to show the great evil of this toll,) freight from, say, Cincinnati to New Orleans is taxed at least 10 per cent. to pass through the canal; and a packet-boat making regular trips of, say, once a week through this canal will be compelled during her life-time, which may be estimated at from four to five years, to pay as much as it would cost to build, furnish, and keep her in repair. The navigation of our river has greatly languished owing to this conduct on the part of the United States in keeping up this tax.

Why is lake and ocean navigation protected by friendly legislation, and river navigation continually burdened by oppressive enactments? Why is the capitalist who has invested a few thousand dollars in a lake or an ocean steamer protected from loss in case of accident, except to the amount of capital invested, when the same amount put into a river steamboat by a merchant, manufacturer, or other person to aid some mechanic to build his boat, to navigate the Ohio River, in the interest of its trade, would render his whole fortune liable for any misfortune that might occur in the shape of an accident or loss of life or property? I refer just now to the act of 1851, entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners," and will read the following, from volume 9, pages 635 and 636 of the Statutes:

An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction, by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending.

* * * * * * * * *

SEC. 7. This act shall not apply to the owner or owners of any canal-boat or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatever used in rivers or inland navigation.

And why is it that the river-man is required to purchase every humbug device that any sharp fellow can get his friends to recommend as a protector to life and property, thereby filling his coffers at the expense of river navigation, and increasing the burden upon commerce? River-men understand what I mean.

There is a great difficulty in the way of safe and profitable river transportation, which I wish to refer to in this connection, although it is a little foreign to the subject under consideration; and that is the obstruction of the river by bridges without proper restrictions, as all experienced river-men know and will tell you. I desire, however, to say in this connection that I am not opposed to granting the right to build bridges, but that great care should be used in giving this power to railroad corporations. I believe that the commerce of the country demands through trunk lines of railroad to carry the productions of the country to commercial centers for distribution. But I am the warm friend of water transportation, because experience has taught me that when we have competition between steamboats, canal-boats, and railroads, the tax on the manufacturer, merchant, and farmer is not more than one-half for freight in shipping their products to market.

In this connection I also desire to say that I am not here for the purpose of waging war upon the railroad interest of the country, and I am sorry that we have not ten or twenty for each one we have to-day; for then we should have employment for all of our skilled and unskilled labor at good wages, because when one road did not need their services another would; and in the same manner the competition between the roads would give us cheap transportation and the producers of the country a good market for their surplus products. As an illustration of this, I need only to call your attention to the competition between the Baltimore and Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Companies, where the expense of transportation for passengers and freight has been reduced one-half within sixty days.

But to return to the subject under consideration, you should remember, when considering this bill, that nearly every dollar's worth of stock is now owned by the Government of the United States; that that stock carries with it the real estate and the improvements of the canal; that this vast interest is placed in the hands of five persons, who retain each one share of stock of $100, in order that they may act in the capacity of directors; and in this manner the United States carries on a toll-gate business for profit against the commerce of the Ohio River; and this portion of the financial affairs of the Government is managed by a committee of private individuals, who act under a technicality of law, instead of being controlled by the financial officers of the Government, as is provided by the laws of the United States.

It might be injudicious to ask just at this time for the Government to appropriate money to build a canal around the Falls of the Ohio for the benefit of the trade of that river, vast as it is, and much as such an improvement would be required. But when it comes to ask not a dollar of appropriation, nor a copper of additional expense, or the incurrence of a cent's worth of debt that the Government is not already bound for and the property of the Government mortgaged to pay, and when the Government, by legislation and by purchase, has in so many ways indicated its policy in respect to this canal, we think that the House should pass this bill.

In 1855 the United States had by purchase become the owner of all but five shares of the canal stock. It afterward, under pressure of financial embarrassment, authorized the borrowing of $1,600,000 for the purpose of improving the canal, which amount was secured by mortgage upon the canal property and improvements, worth more than $4,000,000, and the indebtedness evidenced by bonds of $1,000 each. These bonds are payable in installments every four years. About $500,000 have already been paid, and the first installment of $400,000 will be payable in 1876. The receipt of tolls at the present rates will not be sufficient to meet this indebtedness; hence the United States will be compelled to increase the rate of tolls, and so increase the burden upon the commerce of the river, or advance the money to pay the debt, or go to protest and let the mortgage be foreclosed.

Now, the question upon which this bill hangs is, ought the United States to pay this debt, or compel the commerce of the river to pay it? Is it the policy of the United States to compel commerce to pay for improvements in the interest of navigation?

Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to improve New York Harbor by deepening the channel at Hell Gate. What would the city of New York say? What would the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce do, and what would the country think, if the Government should station a revenue-cutter there, and exact from every vessel, of whatever size, destination, or capacity, a tax upon its tonnage for the privilege of passing over the improvement until such sum as the improvement cost shall be paid for? Why, Mr. Speaker, the whole East would come down, or send their wise men, to repeal such a law. It would be called unjust and cursed as outrageous by everybody in the country. Why, sir, the great State of New York, from Lake Erie to the ocean, would rise in rebellion to prevent such an outrageous act of injustice to her commerce, and I am of the opinion that the distinguished gentleman to whom I have referred would be the leader in such a movement. And yet this is but an exact illustration of the present attitude of the United States in respect to the commerce of the Ohio River which passes Louisville.

I, as a Representative of the people of the fifth district of Kentucky, a constituency whose interest in this matter is affiliated with the interests of one-fourth of the people of the Union, am sorry to say that the only opposition we find is from the East and the far Northwest, which have never tired of knocking at the doors of Congress for aid, and whose commerce has been so well protected by the Government, not only in the building of light-houses and improvement of harbors, but by aid granted to railroads in the interest of internal trade.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the navigators of that river are willing to pay as much as will liquidate the expenses of superintendence and repair of the canal, leaving that sum to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury, and all they ask is that they be allowed to use the canal upon these terms—a privilege which the Government is authorized fully to grant, and cannot in justice refuse to give.

Is it nothing that the people of the great cities bordering this river have in the strongest terms, through their boards of trade and chambers of commerce, expressed their desire for the passage of this bill?

Is it nothing that the Representatives of the people of the vast territory interested in the navigation of this river are a unit in asking for its passage—a representation comprising at least one-fourth of the population of the United States, and which pays nearly one-half of the internal revenue of the country?

Mr. Speaker, it appeared strange to me that the claim of the city of Louisville for taxes should stand in the way of consummating a measure so important to the commerce of the Ohio River, when that claim, if insisted upon, would have had to have been adjudicated by the courts. I knew that my constituents did not want this claim for taxes if it was to be a burden upon this commerce, and it seemed to me that that question was settled by act of the Kentucky Legislature, passed January 16, 1838, and which still stands unrepealed upon the statute-books.

And just here I wish to say that the State of Kentucky, in order to make free this commerce, had taken away, by the act referred to, from her commercial metropolis the right of taxing this property, from which, had the tax been levied, it would have received an amount in excess of the sum which the United States will have to assume to carry out the provisions of the bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, if there ever was anything in the claim of Louisville to tax this canal property, she has given it up by this ordinance, which I have just received, and will read:

THE LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

OFFICE OF THE CITY ATTORNEY,
March 25, 1874.

SIR: The seventeenth section of an act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the city of Louisville," approved January 16, 1838, is as follows:

"SEC. 17. That the lands of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, nor the stock held therein, shall be liable to be assessed for city taxation; and all of that part of the present charter of said city which authorizes the city council to impose a tax upon said canal be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The act of the Legislature from which the above is taken will be found in Elliot's Laws and Ordinances, page 74. After a careful examination, I have been unable to find that this specific exemption from assessment and taxation for municipal purposes has been in express terms repealed. The discovery of this exemption was made since the suit was brought, and is now presented as a bar to our action. I think the exemption would be held, and advise that the claim for taxes be abandoned.

Respectfully,

T. L. BURNETT,
City Attorney.

HON. CHARLES P. RUDD,
Chairman Joint Committee on Revision.

The communication was accompanied by the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has under consideration the payment of the debt on the Louisville and Portland Canal, with the view of taking possession of the same, and making it practically free to the commerce of the Ohio River; and as the only obstacle to the passage through Congress of the bill for this purpose is the claim of the city of Louisville for taxes assessed against said canal property:

Resolved by the general council of the city of Louisville, That the city attorney be, and he is hereby, directed to suspend action in the suit now pending against the Louisville and Portland Canal Company for taxes; and, in the event that said canal property should pass into the hands of the General Government, the city of Louisville hereby relinquishes all right, title, and interest whatever she may have in any claim for taxes against it.

The resolution was adopted by the unanimous vote of the lower board, having first been approved by the board of aldermen. So the objection based upon that fact is done away with.

As regards the claim of the Campbell heirs, the courts have long ago settled it in favor of the canal company.

Mr. Speaker, this question presents itself to my mind as one involving the financial policy of the Government in this, that the United States is the only one interested to any great extent in the property of the canal, it being the owner of every dollar's worth of stock, except five shares, of $100 each, retained by the directors, in order to keep up a show of an organization. And the directors are all men in whom I have the greatest confidence, and who stand high in the community in which they live, and deservedly so; it is the principle to which I refer under which in this manner are managed the financial affairs of the Government. Why, sir, you might as well let out the Treasury and have it run by contract.

It seems to me to be beneath the dignity of the United States to manage a corporation like this in such an underhanded way to make a profit off the Ohio River for the privilege of permitting steamboats to pass a natural obstruction in a national highway. I wish to say in this connection that I am unable to understand why a Government like ours should hesitate between assuming a few hundred thousand dollars and paying it outright. If the Secretary was authorized to issue 6 per cent. currency bonds, payable at the same time as the outstanding canal bonds which he proposes to assume, and exchangeable therefor, I have no doubt but that the bondholders would accept such a change, and by this plan the Government would not have one cent more to pay than she assumes, and all parties would be benefited by the transaction.

In 1844 the Legislature of Kentucky passed a law authorizing the United States to take possession of this canal property, which reads substantially as follows:

In the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is an ingenious attempt to kill the bill, and that would be its practical result if passed.

The Legislature of Kentucky does not meet for two years, and during the whole time the commerce of the river will be burdened with this taxation. The State of Kentucky has been for more than thirty years last past attempting to give this canal to the United States, and we had supposed that every law which any legal mind could conceive of to that end had been enacted; but here comes the gentleman from New York with a proviso which he conceives necessary to a proper transfer of this canal property. We must view his objection in that light to be charitable, for there is only one other light to view it in, and that is that he has thrown in his amendment for the purpose of hindering and postponing the beneficial results of this bill by a technical objection, for what purpose I cannot conceive.

To hint that Kentucky, after what she has already done, would refuse to put any seal necessary upon this transfer, is an insult to that State. To say that she has not already done her part to do so, is to my mind a woful lack of comprehension of the legal effect of laws, or an ignorance of the laws and resolutions which our Legislature has passed.

Kentucky is not so much interested in the passage of this bill as the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and I believe, sir, that so much are the people of these States interested in this measure that, could they be consulted, they would not hesitate to pay the first installment of canal bonds due if that would have the effect to accomplish its immediate enactment; indeed, I believe that it would pay the present commerce of the river to subscribe that amount for that purpose; but we have no right to and do not expect this of the Representatives of the people of the United States. We are entitled to have this bill passed as it came from the committee, and that is what we ask.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will pass the House. I consider it an act not only of simple justice to the people interested in the navigation of the Ohio River, but a matter of duty upon the part of the Government in the management of its financial affairs.

Since the year 1842 my own State, which is the creator of this company, has advanced everything consistent and required to carry out this plan; has conceded everything that could be construed into an objection on her part to turning over this property to the United States, and now asks the Government to carry out its part of the contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allotted me in this discussion, to undertake to say anything about the general importance of this bill. I take it for granted, sir, that, in view of the frequent discussions of the subject, in various sessions of Congress, in the various sessions of the Legislature of Kentucky, and the various commercial conventions that have been held all through the West, and in view of the interest evinced in this matter throughout the entire country, every intelligent man is acquainted to a very large extent with its importance. I take it for granted that there is no purpose on the part of the House to refuse to pass this bill. And I take it for granted, too, Mr. Speaker, that even the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] the chairman of the committee—although not authorized by the committee to be offered—is offered by him in good faith; and I take it for granted that that gentleman does not desire to interfere with the passage of some bill by which this object can be accomplished.

But I propose, sir, to devote the time I have to the discussion of this amendment alone, and for the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this amendment practically annuls every provision of the bill, and practically takes away from the parties who are intended to be benefited all the remedy that the bill proposes to apply to their case. Now, Mr. Speaker, this may not appear upon its face, but if gentlemen of the House will consider its provisions I think they will find themselves placed just in this position: that by voting for this amendment they practically destroy the purpose of the bill, and that they must either vote down the amendment, or, having put the amendment upon the bill, the bill itself remains of no value to the parties who have advocated it and who are interested in it.

The amendment provides that the Secretary of the Treasury "shall pay no money under the provisions of this act, nor shall the Secretary of War take possession of said canal as authorized by the next section, until the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax, or in any way to assess, said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Legislature of the State of Kentucky were in session, I do not know that I would object to having the gentleman from New York draw just such legislative act as he thought best, and have it submitted to the action of that body; because, from the whole history of that body, I am satisfied that they would be disposed to enact any law that any gentleman might regard as fair and proper in the management of this great commercial enterprise. But the difficulty is, that the Legislature of the State of Kentucky is not in session, and will not be in session for two years.

Mr. Speaker, the commerce of the Ohio, of the Missouri, and of the Mississippi, and the people interested in it, have, during the last forty years, paid $5,500,000 toward the construction of this canal. The gentleman proposes that since its enlargement we shall continue to pay tolls until the State of Kentucky shall cede jurisdiction. The average amount of tolls paid by the commerce of those rivers in the last forty years has been about $125,000 per annum. The amount estimated for the present year, under the enlargement of the canal, is $350,000, and I undertake to say that for the two years following a very large part of the $1,000,000 of indebtedness that still remains will have been swept away by this tax upon the commerce of the country; or, in other words, the amendment is simply a proposition that, instead of the Congress of the United States relieving commerce from this enormous burden of taxation, that commerce shall be compelled, in addition to the five and a half millions that have already been paid, to pay the million that is yet due and necessary to put this work entirely out of debt.

Mr. Speaker, if the State of Kentucky had never ceded this jurisdiction there might be some reason for this amendment. I propose very briefly to show the members of this House that that jurisdiction has been as fully and as completely ceded by the State of Kentucky to the United States as it is possible for it to be done in any words.

As has been stated upon the floor of this House, this canal company was originally organized in 1825. The canal was finished, I think, some time in the year 1831. It was evident from the start that it was a work of so much national importance, bearing through it, as it did, the commerce of one-third of all the present States of the country; affecting, as it did, the commerce of those great internal rivers and of the people who live between the Alleghanies and the Rocky Mountains, it became evident at the start that it was of such magnitude that it should be controlled by the Government of the United States. This matter was much discussed between the years 1830 and 1840. In 1842, the Legislature of the State of Kentucky took the first step toward putting this property in the hands of the United States. I call the particular attention of gentlemen to this statute, and to an amendment to it made in 1844, under which the stock now held by the United States was acquired, and which I claim was as perfect and complete a title in the Government of the United States, and as complete a cession on the part of the State of Kentucky, as it would be possible for them under any circumstances, or by the employment of any language, to make. The act of the Legislature of Kentucky of 1842 provided in its first section—

That the act incorporating the Louisville and Portland Canal Company shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended that, whenever the stockholders in said company shall so direct, the board of president and directors of said company shall have the privilege of selling the shares of stock owned by individuals in said canal to the United States, or the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls; or, further, to effect this object, the board of president and directors, when so authorized as aforesaid, shall hereby have the privilege of appropriating the net income arising from said canal to the purchase of said stock instead of making dividends therewith.

The second section provides that the net income shall be applied to the purchase of shares of stock.

The third section provides the manner in which shares shall be purchased.

The fourth section is as follows:

Be it further enacted, That the shares so purchased by said board shall be held in trust by it, for the purposes herein declared, and shall be voted on by them at all subsequent meetings and elections, until, by the operation of the provisions of this act, all the shares standing in the name of others than the Government of the United States shall have been purchased up; and when the said shares shall be all purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal, only sufficient to keep the same in repair, and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements, so as fully to answer the purposes of its establishment; and, further to protect and guard the interests of commerce, the superintendents or agents in charge of said canal shall ever hereafter, on the first Monday in January, annually, report to the General Assembly of Kentucky the amount of tolls levied and received, and of the charges and expenses incurred on the same—the General Assembly reserving the right of directing the amount annually to be collected, if found too much for the purposes contemplated by this amended act.

Now it is precisely the last two clauses of this fourth section of the act of 1842 that the gentleman from New York seems to refer to in this amendment, and he refers to them precisely as if they yet stood upon the statute-book of Kentucky.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPEER. I move that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] will refer to the acts of the subsequent session of the Legislature of Kentucky he will find that on the 22d of February, 1844, the act which I have just read was amended as follows:

That in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States; and no annual report, as mentioned in the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, shall be required to be made by the United States, or the agents and superintendents of said canal, to the General Assembly of this Commonwealth.

That constitutes a perfect cession on the part of Kentucky. But gentlemen say these are not perhaps subsisting statutes, but have subsequently been affected by other legislation of Kentucky. I undertake to say that no subsequent statute of Kentucky can affect these acts of 1842 and 1844, because under those acts, and by virtue of that contract, (and I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to this fact,) all the outstanding shares of stock were purchased. Gentlemen will find in a table contained in the report of the committee a statement of the purchases that were made between the years 1841 and 1855, and while this legislation of Kentucky was subsisting. I contend that it is still subsisting and can never be changed by the State of Kentucky. Under that contract, ceding entire jurisdiction to the United States, the United States became the possessors of the seven thousand and ninety-three outstanding shares.

I do not care if the Legislature of the State of Kentucky in 1872 did pass an act by which she imposed certain conditions upon her cession. Her cession was completed by the act of 1844, and the perfect right to take possession accrued to the Government of the United States in 1855. It was a vested right, of which the Government of the United States could not be dispossessed by any action of the Legislature of Kentucky, nor could any subsequent conditions be imposed upon that right, although I desire to say that in my judgment the conditions imposed by the act of 1872 are not important, and not to any great extent objectionable. I am sorry I will not have time to discuss them.

In 1855, when all these shares had been purchased by the United States, the board of president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal sent their report to James Guthrie, then Secretary of the Treasury, (I am sorry I have not time to read these documents,) stating to him that the entire purchase had been made, and that the State of Kentucky was prepared to hand over to the Government of the United States the possession and control of this work and of the property connected with it.

At that time James Guthrie, of his own motion, asked that five of these shares might be retained, one by each of five individuals, in order that they might formally perpetuate this corporation for the benefit of the United States, and until the United States saw fit, in some proper form, to take possession of it, and necessary arrangements had been made to do that. I contend that from that moment (and to this proposition I invite the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who is a lawyer) these five men simply became trustees, holding for the benefit of the United States; they were depositaries of a naked trust.

Mr. WHEELER. I take direct issue with the gentleman on that proposition, but I will not argue it now.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Very well; I will be glad to hear it argued. I maintain that those five persons became depositaries of a naked trust. As every book of equity will say, they are absolutely trustees without an interest; they have no interest; and from the day they accepted and continued to hold these five shares of stock at the instance of Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, they held them as trustees for the benefit of the people of the United States. And in the discussion and determination of this question they have no possible right to be considered, except as to the amount of their individual stock, and except as their position may affect the bondholders; and this has been substantially held by Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court.

Mr. SPEER. They could not refuse to sell to the Government the stock they held.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. They could not, because the contract under the act of 1842 was adopted with the unanimous consent of all these parties, and this is merely a perpetuation of that arrangement at the instance of the United States and with the consent of these men.

This anomalous condition of things is presented: Five men, who have each $100 interest in a work of the value of $10,000,000, absolutely managing and controlling the whole enterprise, and receiving and disbursing an income of from $300,000 to $500,000 a year, as will be the case hereafter. One is president, one is secretary, one is treasurer, one is attorney, and the other something else, I do not know what. [A voice: "A banker."] I believe they are all bankers, but I am not certain. I am not abusing these gentlemen; I do not say they have not discharged their trust fairly and properly. But I do say that it is now time that the commerce of this great portion of the country shall have relief from the burdens heretofore imposed upon it, and it is now time for the Government of the United States to take possession of and manage its own property.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STANARD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. STANARD. I desire to occupy probably not more than ten minutes. I will say that this subject has been before the Committee on Commerce, of which I am a member, during this session. When I left here some ten days ago for the West, I did not expect that there would be any opposition from that committee to this proposition. It was then believed that it would be put in such a shape as certainly would be satisfactory to the Committee on Commerce and satisfactory to the House. I had no idea this morning of saying a word on this subject, and will now occupy but a few moments, and that at the solicitation of gentlemen who are more especially interested in this subject than I am or can be, as this canal is many hundred miles from the State which I in part have the honor to represent here.

But I am an advocate, and have ever been in my feeble way, for unrestricted and untaxed commerce upon the rivers of this country. We of the West, as well as you of the East, have all known for many years that this Louisville and Portland Canal was a great bone of contention. The people of the Ohio River have believed it a great burden upon them, that they should be taxed fifty cents a ton upon the registered tonnage of all vessels that passed through this canal; not upon the tonnage itself, because a boat or a barge might be capable of holding two thousand tons of freight and only carry three hundred tons or five hundred tons through this canal, yet she is taxed fifty cents upon her registered tonnage; thereby, in many instances, making the tax upon the towage of coal or iron almost as much as the freight would be for the whole transportation.

It is not strange that the people of the Ohio Valley have protested against this enormous tax, especially at this time, when there is such a cry coming up from the entire country for cheaper and for additional transportation facilities for the people of the West as well as of the East.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill passes, it requires no additional appropriation from the Government to carry out its provisions; that the appropriation was made last year for the purpose of buying these bonds; that the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion was authorized to proceed, but that he found out when he commenced to negotiate (as he states in Executive Document 218, giving a synopsis of the whole affair) that there were certain claims being prosecuted against this canal, and he desired additional consideration or legislation before he proceeded—he did not wish to assume the responsibility in this case. One of the matters to which he referred was the institution of a claim by the city of Louisville for taxes upon this canal. It has been shown by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANDEFORD] who has just addressed the House that the city council of Louisville have instructed their attorney to withdraw this claim for taxes now pending. Hence that matter is disposed of; and hence it seems to me, so far as that is concerned, there is no necessity for the amendment which is offered to this bill by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] as that matter is not now pending. The claim has been withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. Could not the same city council order their attorneys to recommence the suit as soon as this bill is passed?

Mr. STANARD. I presume the council might do that; but I have no idea that they would.

Then, sir, it is claimed further that there is a dispute relative to the title, and that the State of Kentucky shall guarantee to the Government of the United States that any title which may be held by Kentucky or her citizens shall be ceded to the Government of the United States.

From the information that I can gather on this subject, I have not the least doubt in the world that if the Legislature of Kentucky was in session it would immediately release, or cause to be released, any jurisdiction that the State or its citizens may have over this canal. But unfortunately for the people of the Ohio Valley and of the country, the Legislature of Kentucky is not now in session, and will not be for two years. It is claimed by lawyers who have most thoroughly investigated this subject that the State of Kentucky has already relinquished its jurisdiction; that it has, so far as it could, guaranteed to the Government of the United States jurisdiction over the canal in case Government should take possession of it. I have not the least doubt that as soon as the Government does take possession of the canal, and assume jurisdiction over it, all these supposed difficulties, which are the merest moonshine, will disappear; that the Government will have entire control and ownership of the canal.

I observe, in glancing over this bill, the following provision:

Provided, however, That no sum of money shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury on account of any claim for either city or State taxes assessed, or to be hereafter assessed, against said company, or against the said canal property, or any of its appendages; and no money shall be paid under the provisions of this act until all claims for said taxes shall have been released.

I do not imagine that the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, in view of their interests, material and otherwise, which are identified with and linked to this canal, will institute any suit or prosecution against the Government when it must thereby damage all the interests involved. I believe, sir, that when this bill is passed (and I believe it ought to be passed to-day) we shall hear no more of these claims of the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, or the Campbell heirs.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.]

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds, I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether he is going to give any opportunity to gentlemen not altogether in possession of full knowledge connected with this bill to say a few words with the view of getting the desired information. All the gentlemen who have spoken thus far have spoken on but one side of the question. The time it nearly out, I suppose; and I desire, if possible, to get some information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the fullest examination of this subject is desired; and when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] concludes, the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] shall have such portions as they may desire of the time I may have remaining.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to have five or ten minutes so I may ask the friends of this bill to enlighten me on some points which do not seem to be very clear. I do not say that I will oppose the bill, but I wish to know in reference to matters about which gentlemen have not spoken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.]

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. HOLMAN. For ten minutes.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this work is a material part of a system of water communication from the head-waters of the Monongahela and Alleghany Rivers to the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of nearly three thousand miles, and upon the bosom of that grand river there floats a tonnage equal to the foreign tonnage which enters into the harbor of New York. Through a remarkable combination of physical circumstances this central channel of trade presents commercial and geographical advantages so eminently conducive to the prosperity of the whole country as to make it the subject of proper consideration for the representatives from every portion of the country, and highly proper that its improvement should be liberally fostered by the General Government. In this connection let me state that the Government has bestowed with lavish hands appropriations for the improvement of the principal harbors of our coast and for other rivers, and in no instance has there been tolerated for one moment the onerous taxation levied for years upon the tonnage and commerce passing through the Louisville and Portland Canal. It is to-day the cheapest avenue for commerce through the interior of the continent; then why should it be taxed or why should we permit a State or corporation to levy a tax of fifty cents per ton on all the registered tonnage passing through it? It has been the policy of the Government, and to-day it is the sentiment of all the people, that we should improve and thereby cheapen transportation on all of our national highways of commerce. If you permit year after year an annual tax of $350,000 to be levied upon the fabrics of the East, upon the fuel and cereals of the West, and upon the sugar, rice, and tobacco of the South, you do a great injustice to not only the people who reside along this artery of trade, but to the consumers everywhere.

I would appeal to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and to the Representatives of the cities of Boston, Buffalo, New Orleans, Charleston, and of the lakes, whether, in view of the liberal expenditures of the Government to improve those harbors, they would tolerate an assessment upon the commerce carried in and out of the harbors of their cities to refund to the Government those expenditures? I anticipate the answer that they would not. I also appeal to the gentlemen who speak so earnestly on this floor in favor of our internal commerce and in favor of the material interests of the country to favor the passage of this bill without restriction.

Mr. Speaker, we live in a day of unlimited production. Our nation rivals the countries where the arts were cradled. Therefore, if we desire to make our nation rich and powerful, let us remove all the unnecessary burdens and build up our commerce; if we desire to make our Government enduring and to fill its coffers, let us remove these burdens and build up our commerce; if we desire to make our people the freest and happiest on earth, let us remove the burdens from commerce and build it up by judicious expenditure where necessary. While this question interests directly but a portion of the States, it affects the traffic and distribution of the products of every State.

Mr. Speaker, this question has been argued in detail, and it is useless for me to travel over the same ground; but in behalf of the steamboat interest, and of those who transport fuel and the products of the West upon this river, I ask favorable action upon this bill as reported without the amendment of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] chairman of the Committee on Commerce. To-day you tax the steamboat interest in every possible way. You compel them to pay a license tax for pilots and engineers; you direct how they shall construct their vessels; you point out the method by which they shall build their machinery; you put upon them patent mechanical devices with the most onerous conditions, and refuse a limit to the responsibility of ownership. Now, while you do all this, I beg of you to remove from them such taxation as should be levied upon all interests alike. The Louisville and Portland Canal is now under the control of the Government, and as such it ought to be maintained, the same as other public works, by annual appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] How much time does he want?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to have twenty minutes, and if I can get through before that all the better.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will limit himself to ten minutes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask the gentleman from Indiana not to limit me to ten minutes. The other side has already had more than an hour and a quarter. I ask the gentleman to give me fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I will yield for that time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to this bill. It is a measure which will take out of the Treasury of the United States one million and a quarter of dollars. So it is worthy of consideration from the amount of money involved in it, if for no other reason. But for what purpose does it take this money? The canal around the Falls of the Ohio River has been in operation since 1831. During the whole of the time the Government, I believe, has been part owner of that canal. Charges or tolls have been levied on the shipping that has passed through it both ways sufficient to pay down to 1869, I understand, all the expenses and all the costs of the canal. So that whatever money the Government may have put into it before that period has been reimbursed; and by a computation which has been presented here it is claimed that it has been reimbursed, and some $25,000 more. Therefore the Government may be said up to that time to be neither debtor nor creditor to the enterprise. Since that time the Government has appropriated directly for improvements upon this canal a million and a quarter of dollars—in more exact figures, $1,278,000—from which it has received no return whatever.

This bill provides that the Government shall appropriate still further $1,172,000, or enough to take up and cancel bonds to the amount of $1,172,000 now outstanding. These bonds are a mortgage lien on the property, the money having been expended for improvements upon the canal. This appropriation of $1,172,000 was made at the last session of Congress, leaving its expenditure to a certain extent at the discretion of the Secretaty of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasnry did not see fit, under that discretion, to take possession of the canal for two reasons. One reason was because he saw no way by which he could at once get possession of these bonds and pay them, as most of them were not yet due, and so come in possession of the canal according to the terms of the act. The other reason was that suit had been brought against this canal property by parties claiming to own the real estate and the entire property; and while that suit was pending the Secretary of the Treasury deemed it unwise, or at least not within his fair discretion, to make use of this appropriation of money for the purpose of taking possession of the canal.

This bill proposes to reappropriate that $1,172,000, and with some conditions which it is hoped by those who present the bill will obviate the objection existing by reason of that suit which is now pending, and by reason of certain other liabilities or incumbrances which may rest upon this property. And the bill proposes one thing more: that after the Government takes possession of this canal it shall be free to the commerce which passes up and down the Ohio River, with the exception of a toll sufficient to pay the running expenses and repairs upon the canal; and the committee are satisfied, from what I suppose to be their best judgment upon that question, that a toll of ten cents per ton of capacity on vessels propelled by steam, and five cents per ton of capacity on vessels propelled otherwise, will be sufficient to meet this.

Now, sir, I say in the first place that in my judgment this provision of the bill is wholly inadequate to meet the current expenses; and I will state why. The report which has been presented in this case shows that the highest rents or tolls received from the canal in any one year, were in 1872; how much they were in 1873 is not shown here, but in 1872 they were $207,000. As I understand, the tolls that are now charged for vessels passing through that canal are fifty cents per ton capacity of the vessel, without respect to whether it is propelled by steam or otherwise. Now, it is obvious that if you cut down the tolls to five cents per ton on one class of vessels and ten cents per ton on the other class, making the tolls an average of seven and a half cents, you will get only one-seventh as much toll for a year as was received in 1872 from the same number of vessels. One-seventh of $207,000 would be about $30,000. That would be all that would be received for toll.

But this report shows in another place a statement of the indebtedness of the company, made I suppose by the directors or managers of the company, in which I find the estimated expenditures on the canal for three months as follows: October, $6,136; November, $5,500; December, $6,000—an average of nearly $6,000 a month for the mere current expenses of the canal, irrespective of repairs, or about $75,000 a year for current expenses. It is obvious, then, that the tolls provided in this bill will not meet one-half of the current expenses of the canal, to say nothing of repairs.

I call the attention of the House to these facts for the purpose of showing that in any event the tolls should be raised at least to twenty cents per ton, irrespective of the character of the vessels; and even then it is very doubtful whether sufficient would be realized to pay the current expenses and repairs.

But, sir, I have one other suggestion which I desire to make in connection with this bill; and it seems to me that it is a consideration worthy the thought of Congress. A canal is an artificial water-way. It is just as much an artificial way as a railroad is an artificial way. I cannot see, in the nature of things, any reason why the Government should be at the expense of maintaining a canal around the Falls of the Ohio River, which would not justify the Government in purchasing the Erie Canal and making it free of toll, or in purchasing any canal in the country and making it free of toll; or in purchasing all the railroads of the country and running them at Government expense; or in purchasing all the turnpikes of the country and maintaining them at the Government charge.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] who preceded me suggested that we should remove the burdens on commerce. Well, sir, I agree that if the Government is putting any burden upon commerce beyond what commerce ought to bear it should be removed. But you cannot lift a burden in the shape of taxation in this country from one class of people without putting it on somebody else. You cannot relieve any class of people of taxation without subjecting some one else to heavier taxation, as it is only thus that you can compensate the Treasury for the deficiency in revenue thus caused. If the Government goes into this business of relieving commerce by furnishing free transportation over artificial ways—for that is substantially the theory of this bill—you are simply taking the burden from a commerce which, it seems to me, is abundantly able to bear it, and putting it on the people of the United States. The Government must have revenue. You cannot run the railroads and canals of the country at the charge of the Government without having money in the Treasury of the United States to run them with, and money does not come from the clouds; it is not rained down; in this country it only gets into the Treasury by being taken out of the pockets of the people. You cannot get it into the Treasury in any other way. You must lay burdens of taxation upon the people of the United States, in order to get money into the Treasury to pay the charges and expenses of the United States. And when the Government takes all the canals of the country into its charge; takes all the railroads of the country into its charge; takes all the turnpikes of the country into its charge, on the plea that burdens must be lifted from commerce, instead of having an expenditure, as now, of $300,000,000 a year, we will have an expenditure of a thousand millions a year, and then, in my judgment, there will be a reaction on the part of the people, and a cry against taxation that will be heard here and everywhere throughout the land.

Even now the people everywhere are asking that these burdens of Government taxation shall be lifted; they are everywhere asking that the expenditures of the Government shall be lessened; and yet propositions are brought here asking, every day and every hour, for more and greater charges upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire that the burdens upon commerce shall be equal.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I agree that they should be equal; but can the gentleman give me any reason why, if he ships a cargo of merchandise by the Ohio River to New Orleans and uses an artificial water-way, the Government should give him out of its Treasury a portion of the expense of that transportation, when it does not do so when he ships by railroad? He may choose to ship his merchandise to New York by rail, and why should not the Government be at the charge of that transportation to New York by rail just as much as for transportation by artificial water-ways?

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he would tolerate a tax on the commerce of the country in any of the harbors of New England, or in any other harbor—at Hell Gate, for instance?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is too broad a question to argue here in fifteen minutes, and the gentleman will excuse me for not arguing it. I understand very well that it is very difficult where you shade off gradually from one class of appropriations to another, from appropriations for harbors and for river improvements to a canal around the Falls of the Ohio, and then to a canal through a flat country connecting navigable waters, and then to a canal through the Alleghany Mountains, and next to railroads; you can make the gradation so gradual that it is difficult to draw a line between any two and say you must stop there. But unless you stop somewhere, it comes to this, that the Government shall pay all these charges and then turn around and take them out of the people in taxation.

Now, all experience shows that, where commerce uses an artificial highway, whether it is a water-way or a railroad, commerce can afford to pay for its use. And what follows? These charges follow the commerce, follow the merchandise, and are added to the price finally charged to the consignee or to the consumer; and in that way the cost is distributed among those who, it seems to me, are the persons who should bear all expense of transportation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] suggests to me—and it seems a forcible suggestion—that by the logic of this bill the Government of the United States could be called upon to reimburse the State of Massachusetts for the money expended on the Hoosac tunnel, for the purpose of relieving commerce of the burden of tolls for the use of that highway. And this only shows how, by taking one step after another, each advance seeming almost precisely the same in principle as the last, you may yet be making startling progress in the direction of relieving all the industries of the country at the public charge; and the end that is sure to come, if this kind of legislation is pursued, is Government communism, when the whole property of the people will be seized by taxation and brought together into one treasury, and then distributed again by legislative enactment for the benefit of those who happen to control a working majority of the law-making power.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before I close I desire to offer an amendment, which I understand the gentleman from Indiana consented that I should offer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The third section of this bill provides that the Secretary of War shall ascertain each year what tolls will probably pay the expenses of the succeeding year, and may apply the tolls so received to pay the current expenses of the canal. I move to amend that section by adding to it the following, to which I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] makes no objection:

But no expenditure or contract for expenditure of money shall be made under the authority of this section in any one year, to an amount greater than the amount received during such year from tolls on said canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that amendment is right. I have no right to accept it, but I suppose there will be no objection.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will permit it to be offered, and the House can vote upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ELDREDGE.) The amendment will be regarded as pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. It is hardly possible in five minutes to review this bill or its history; and I have to regret that my careful and considerate friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has felt it necessary to apportion so much time to the pronounced advocates of this bill, and so little to those who wish to examine its details.

I have nothing to say against the policy of the bill which is to exempt commerce from taxation. Its object is laudable; the means of accomplishing that object present a question to which I desire for about ten minutes to get the attention of the House.

The last Congress appropriated nominally $100,000 for completing the Louisville and Portland Canal; and then provided for the payment of all its debts, "and the sum of money necessary for that is hereby appropriated." In looking at that simple clause in the river and harbor appropriation bill of last Congress I was utterly surprised to find that under that language was covered an appropriation intended to run for ten or fifteen years and embracing between one and one and a half million dollars. The bill now before the House perpetuates that legislation of the last Congress; and in addition it proposes not to consider the relations of the State of Kentucky and the United States in connection with these appropriations, but demands that the United States shall perpetuate the appropriations of $1,172,000 and $100,000, and add to it the purchase of this stock. All this without a satisfactory declaration from the State of Kentucky that when we have done it she will not quarrel with us about the jurisdiction of the canal. That is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House and of the friends of this bill.

In 1842 Kentucky proposed an arrangement with the United States, but with various conditions. The United States could not accept those conditions. In 1844 Kentucky passed another act, in which she proposed generally to cede jurisdiction, but specially named one of the classes of jurisdiction retained, by which she seemed therefore to perpetuate the other claim of jurisdiction, namely, that of fixing the rate of toll after the United States should have taken possession, so that the rate should only be sufficient to keep the canal in repair. There was a general cession of jurisdiction, and then a special point named in that cession, which, by the law of expressio unius exclusio alterius, would indicate a doubt whether that was a complete cession of jurisdiction.

Thirdly, to increase my doubt, the State of Kentucky now comes by its joint resolution of 1872, before the conditions of the former cession of jurisdiction were complied with by the United States, and says to us, "We retain general police jurisdiction, and not only we, the State of Kentucky, but the city of Louisville retains her jurisdiction to empty into the canal everything except mud and garbage," &c. But the retention of partial jurisdiction by the State of Kentucky, and the retention of partial rights by the city of Louisville, are two things asserted by the State of Kentucky in the year of our Lord 1872, twenty-eight years after she proposed to cede jurisdiction to the United States, and before we have taken possession under that action of cession.

My State-rights friends should certainly relieve us from involving ourselves by legislation in an embarrassed contradiction with the State of Kentucky. In 1872 she asserts the right of jurisdiction. We propose now to pass a bill, unless the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] is adopted, which does not postpone our payment of nearly a million and a half of money until the State of Kentucky shall give us a clean bill of sale of that canal. To that I am opposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield five minutes to my colleague from the Indianapolis district, [Mr. COBURN.]

Mr. COBURN. Very little can be said on this question in five minutes. The argument of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. KASSON] seems to imply that some conditions imposed by the State of Kentucky are an obstruction in the way of the Government taking possession of and running this canal; or at least that what has been said in the shape of a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky is in the nature of a threat to the General Government that should be withdrawn before Congress acts. If we were about to construct this canal now that question would have some importance. But it can cut no figure whatever in the adjustment of this question as it is at present.

This canal is already made; the money of the Government has been expended upon it; the property is there; it is in the public use. It is not like a case where the Government is about to construct a custom-house or post-office, and makes it a condition-precedent that the jurisdiction of the State shall be yielded to it before the work is done. The thing is accomplished; the work is done; the canal is being used. There is no reason now for attaching a condition which at the most will be useless and inoperative; because nothing can attach to this condition, and nothing can be the consequence of imposing the condition if attached. All that was intended to be done has been done without the condition; it is too late to talk about conditions now.

I regard the joint resolution of Kentucky prescribing the conditions upon which jurisdiction is to be yielded over the grounds occupied by this canal as insulting to the United States as they are empty. What right have they in Kentucky to limit the tolls, to reserve ways for bridges, for sewerage, and other things, in connection with a work of the General Government—for more than twenty years owned, managed, and possessed by the United States?

But, Mr. Speaker, the great consideration after all is not this matter of conditions. The question is whether the commerce in a portion only of this country shall be in a great measure free. Why, sir, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] a few moments ago, talked in violent opposition to the Government going into the business of transportation and the construction of artificial water-ways for commerce. I ask you, sir, whether or not the provision for light-houses; whether or not the provision for dredging out the entrance to the hundred harbors of the sea and lake coasts; whether or not the provisions made year after year for dredging out the Saint Clair Flats and the Detroit River, and the long line of lake communication under appropriations by Congress, are not as much liable to objection on the ground stated by the gentleman from Vermont as the construction of the Louisville and Portland Canal? During a part of the year any boat can pass over the Falls of the Ohio. I have myself gone in a steamboat over those falls when no man could tell that there was a fall or an obstruction there. Why you can, with a light class of boats, pass over the Saint Clair Flats, and over other routes not improved by the Government, and near to those that have been dredged by expenditures of the Government. These ways of commerce, it is true, are in part artificial; but the Government has never taken and never will take the position that the ways of commerce cannot in some measure be artificially improved, on that it is not its duty to improve such channels. Much more money has been expended on other channels of commeree than on this without one thought of toll or charge. This one has paid its way, and more than done so. There is no reason for it; no reason why it should not be free.

Why, sir, if the doctrine of the gentleman from Vermont be carried out, we will roll back the wheels of progress; we give up all that we have done in the way of internal improvements and other facilities for commerce; we destroy our light-houses; we allow the channels of our harbors and rivers to fill up. It seems to me that the doctrine the gentleman from Vermont has advanced is one that would reverse the entire practice of the Government from the beginning, and would take us back into an era of barbarism. We are dredging the Mississippi; we are dredging the Missouri; we are dredging the harbors of all our great sea-ports; we are spending hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars to clean out the channels at the city of New York. Why, why then, shall this toll be imposed upon the dwellers in the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi? I say there is no more reason for retaining a 10 per cent. toll upon this commerce than there would be for putting a charge of 10 per cent. upon the tonnage that enters into the harbor of Philadelphia or Baltimore. But 50 per cent. has been the rate upon the capacity of all vessels, no difference what the load was. And the gentleman from Vermont would retain that. It is a monstrous exaction, that cannot be removed too soon.

The bill before the House does not in my judgment go far enough. Why should the local trade of the Ohio River be assessed for the purpose of keeping the locks and canal in repair? Why not tax every vessel that enters New York or Baltimore to repair those harbors? It is the duty of the whole country to keep the great highways of commerce open. And there are very few equal to the Ohio River in importance.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOODFORD.]

Mr. WOODFORD. Mr. Speaker, educated to believe that ours is one great nation; that all that makes for the true welfare of any part, makes for the true welfare of the whole, I believe that these internal rivers should be improved precisely as the mouth of the Mississippi has been cared for, and as the commerce on the coast has been protected. I shall not weary the House by prolonged remarks. Let me simply suggest that I believe that the great State of New York, with its far-reaching commercial interests, heartily favors everything that will develop the internal commerce of the country, precisely as it favors that which develops the external commerce of the country. We shall gladly do all in our power to make these great navigable rivers the free, sufficient highways of the commerce of the future.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before this discussion is closed, I desire to again call the attention of the House to the real question involved, although I think it has already been very fairly presented. It is, sir, whether the Government shall take possession of and control this canal which belongs to itself. It is not whether money shall be appropriated for the construction of a work of internal improvement, but whether the Government shall take charge of its own property, and apply it according to its original purpose as a free channel of commerce, or whether this important public work shall remain in the hands of the irresponsible parties—irresponsible to the Government—now controlling it.

I hope the House will consider the anomalous condition of this work. As members have doubtless learned from the report of the committee, there were ten thousand shares of stock in this canal company, of which the Government of the United States owns ninety-nine hundred and ninety-five, and has done so ever since 1855. Five shares were retained, at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury, by five persons to constitute a board of directory of this work. The House will also understand that Congress has no control over those five directors. They are not officers of the Government. They make no report to Congress. Congress has not fixed their salaries. Congress does not regulate the income or the expenditures of the canal in any form whatever. The question involved here is, then, whether the Government shall take charge of a work which emphatically belongs to itself, and which it has owned since 1855, and regulate and control it for the purposes of Congress.

Gentlemen refer to the question of surrender of jurisdiction of this work by the State of Kentucky. I desire to call attention to the language of Mr. Justice Miller in deciding the injunction case which arose in 1872. He says:

> The United States is the only stockholder of this corporation. The directors have really no personal interest in the corporation or its property. They are, to all purposes, what equity calls trustees without an interest, the depositaries of a naked trust.

To be sure Mr. Justice Miller overlooks the fact that these five shares are outstanding, or perhaps attached no importance to the fact; and the House will perceive that by the joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky passed February 22, 1844, which has already been read, the extinguishment of those five shares is necessary to invest the Government with the complete jurisdiction sought to be surrendered, and certainly surrendered by that joint resolution. This bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall forthwith pay off those five shares of stock, being $500, with interest since November 9, 1864. When that is done the title of the Government is, of course, complete.

Now, as to the question of taxation. I deny the liability of this work to any taxation. This bill provides that no money shall be paid until any right of taxation claimed by the State of Kentucky or the city of Louisville has been fully, completely surrendered up to the United States. Why, then, this discussion of the question of taxation? Not a dollar is to be paid under this bill until there has been complete surrender of any right of taxation that exists. The bill assumes that the General Government takes possession of the work under the act of Kentucky ceding full and complete jurisdiction, of February 22, 1844, so soon as the stock shall all become the property of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another fact has been referred to by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] He has spoken of the tolls necessary to keep this work in repair. I wish to say distinctly, speaking for myself, that I am not in favor of any of these works remaining a charge upon the Government after they are finally completed. I wish, however, to say that this work should have proper superintendence and be kept in proper repair by a proper tax on the commerce passing through it. And I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to the fact that General Weitzel, a member of the Corps of Engineers, who has had charge of this work for years, reports to the Secretary of War that a tonnage of seven cents is all that would be required to superintend and keep this work in repair. That will be found on page 11 of General Weitzel's report. The Committee on Commerce propose, however, to impose a tonnage tax of ten cents for the care and repair of the work.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I also quoted from General Weitzel's report showing that a tax of 50 per cent. only produced $207,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The estimate of the engineer who has been in charge of this work for years, whose integrity is undoubted and is conceded on all hands, is that a tonnage tax of seven cents will answer the purpose. I admit the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who will consume the last hour of this debate, will perhaps show that the amount of revenue from the Louisville and Portland Canal is only something over $200,000 per annum; but can my friend say that is the whole revenue? The trouble is that here are irresponsible persons holding this vast avenue of commerce belonging rightfully and exclusively to the United States, persons who are at least irresponsible to Congress or to any other power, so far as I am informed, to regulate their operations. Can the gentleman from Vermont say what are the actual revenues?

The truth is the whole matter is under the control of these irresponsible persons, and they collect and apply the revenues to suit themselves. What are the salaries which they pay to themselves? What do they pay for superintendence? How much to their president and attorney? There is no well-regulated government which would leave a work of its own in the anomalous condition in which this work is left. It is incredible, too, that such an irresponsible power over an extended commerce could exist in our Government.

But if gentlemen want a tax of more than ten cents, if they think more than ten cents is necessary for the superintendence of this work and to keep it in repair, let them make that motion and I will not object to any reasonable proposition. I wish this work to pay its own expenses. If any gentleman from examination is satisfied that a larger tonnage tax is necessary, let him submit his amendment. I do not wish this work should remain a charge upon the Government.

Another objection has been stated. Let me ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] this question: Whether the revenues of the canal have not for years been applied to the extinguishment of stock? Has any other work in the Union borne such a tax?

Mr. KASSON. No money has been paid into the Treasury from receipts, but has all been expended on the canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the contrary, over $24,000, as is shown by this report, has been paid back to the Treasury after refunding to the Government the amount originally paid. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa not to forget the extensive works and improvements made in his own State. Let me refer him to the Rock Island Canal and to the Des Moines Rapids Canal, on which the Government has spent over $2,500,000. Now, does the gentleman say they are to be subjected to taxation? Does he propose that the commerce of his State and of the country generally shall be taxed for those canals on the Upper Mississippi? Does the gentleman suggest we should impose a tax upon those canals? Will he ask for benefits to his section of the Union he would deny to another?

Mr. KASSON. If necessary to keep them in repair, with an empty Treasury, I should certainly do it. I wish to say to the gentleman, however, that the United States, after this payment, will have more than paid the fair cost of this Louisville and Portland Canal. There is no improvement in the Mississippi River which cost as much as this. It cost $1,709,000 up to 1865.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman may be correct, but I will again ask him the question, does he propose to bring forward a proposition that the commerce of the Upper Mississippi should be taxed because of the Rock Island Canal and the Des Moines Canal? Are the gentlemen interested in that great improvement of the Sault Sainte Marie Canal asking that a tax shall be imposed because of that improvement? Why, then, should you make this an exceptional case? There are other works built by the Government all of which are substantially free, and the commerce passing through this canal alone is the subject of oppressive taxation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And more commerce passes through this canal than all the others put together.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say to the gentleman that a tax has been imposed upon the commerce passing through Sault Sainte Marie Canal, varying year after year, for the purpose of its superintendence and to keep it in repair.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much?

Mr. CONGER. It has varied from year to year from fifteen to seven cents.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right, and this bill proposes to impose the amount of taxation upon the commerce passing through this canal for the same purpose.

Mr. CONGER. But I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say there was never any tax imposed upon the Sault Sainte Marie Canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; no tax for construction; all I am asking is that the necessary tonnage tax only shall be imposed for the purpose of keeping this canal in repair and providing for its proper superintendence. I ask that no more tax should be put upon the commerce passing through the Louisville and Portland Canal than is imposed upon the commerce passing through the Rock Island Canal or through the Sault Sainte Marie Canal, and others similar, which improvements were made by large expenditures from the national Treasury. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] certainly cannot ask that we shall make a discrimination in favor of the commerce of one section of the Union, and against the commerce of another section. It would be unjust and ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. Speaker, it is not true, as the gentleman from Iowa supposed and intimated, that Congress was blind in its legislation of last session in making this appropriation. No subject was ever more fully and carefully discussed. The facts were all before the House as completely as we have them now, showing the appropriation was understood to be $1,172,000, or enough to pay the 1,172 bonds of $1,000 each issued by this company under the act of Congress of 1860 to enlarge the canal.

The gentleman will find that the Congressional Globe fully shows that fact. We understood the matter then just as we do now. It is now proposed to continue that appropriation. Why? Because these bonds are due as follows:

In 1873, 373, for	$373,000
In 1881, 399, for	399,000
In 1886, 400, for	400,000
In all, 1,172, for	1,172,000

This bill, then, is virtually appropriating $1,172,000 to be paid during a period of twelve years. I wish gentlemen to understand fully the effect of this bill, and that this is necessary to be done to relieve an extended commerce which has borne the heaviest exactions that any commerce in the United States has borne to this hour.

Up to 1872, as General Weitzel's report shows, the Ohio River commerce has paid the following tax at this canal:

Mr. Speaker, I cannot anticipate the line of argument which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] may indulge in. This bill declares that we take possession of that canal for the United States as its own property by virtue of the act of the 21st of February, 1844, of the Legislature of Kentucky. The gentleman comes forward now with his amendment and proposes that no payment shall be made under this bill by the Secretary of the Treasury until jurisdiction shall be surrendered by Kentucky over this canal to the United States. The House sees, of course, that the gentleman's proposition is in direct conflict with the propositions contained in the bill. The surrender of that jurisdiction by the joint resolution of February 21, 1844, was unquestionably complete, and the Government has acted on that assumption ever since. The letters of the Secretary of the Treasury before us fully sustain that view.

Kentucky has not up to this time indicated any want of good faith. That which you have a right to apprehend is that these five gentlemen, who, without any authority from the United States, are using your revenues, derived from taxation of your commerce, to the amount of $350,000 a year, and fixing their own salaries and disposing of this money as they may think proper, may not be as careful of your interests and the interests of the Government as your own officers might be, and as Congress should be. They may act fairly, but you have no guarantee of that beyond the personal character of these gentlemen. And yet the amendment of the gentleman from New York proposes to perpetuate that anomalous state of things for the next two years. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] this question: whether he is willing that for two years the commerce of the Ohio River shall be submitted to a taxation of $700,000, as would be the case if this amendment became law, if General Weitzel's report is correct, under the control of five gentlemen who give no bonds and take no oath of office, are entirely irresponsible to the United States as to the mode in which they will expend this vast sum of money and execute this great trust? Is he willing to put that amount of the taxation of this country under the control of five gentlemen who are not even required to make any report to Congress of their doing, or in any sense responsible to the United States? You do not even know who these gentlemen are.

Mr. KASSON. I answer, Mr. Speaker, that I would be glad, if they used their power that way, to take it away from them. But how $700,000 can be levied in two years, when the tolls only yielded in the last year for which we have a report a little over $200,000, I do not know.

Mr. HOLMAN. But will the gentleman put even $400,000—one-third of the whole amount involved in paying these bonds, the bonds being for $1,172,000—under the control of these, to you, irresponsible parties; $400,000 in the charge of five unknown parties, who make no reports to Congress, nor recognize your authority? But let me ask the gentleman another question. He speaks of a revenue of $200,000, but he overlooks the fact that an engineer, in whose integrity the most implicit confidence can be reposed, General Weitzel, reports the revenues at $350,000 a year.

Mr. KASSON. I took the figures from the report which was also referred to by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] that the statement of General Weitzel for the last year reported showed a revenue of $207,000. I may be mistaken, but that was what I took the figures from.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. General Weitzel in his report gives the reason why the revenue was not so large in 1872, and shows conclusively, I think, that the revenues could not fall short of $350,000 a year. So that the House is asked to keep this work in its present anomalous condition for two years longer and allow five unknown parties to impose a toll upon your commerce to an amount of $700,000, without any obligation to appropriate a dollar of it for the extinguishment of this debt.

Mr. SPEER. Before the gentleman resumes his seat I wish to ask him one question. This bill proposes to pay off the indebtedness of the corporation, which I understand to be about $1,200,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. One million one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask the gentleman what those bonds have been selling at in the market during the past year? This will bring them to par; and if these bonds have been bought by the parties who hold them now at fifty, sixty, or seventy-five cents on the dollar, it would be a gross wrong on the people of this country to pass this bill, which would appreciate them to par and compel the Government to redeem them at par. There ought to be an amendment providing that the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to purchase the bonds, not at the market value, but at the price paid by the holders with interest. There should be no speculation or jobbery on the part of the holders.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a moment to answer that question.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire that my friend should not limit himself to moments at all; he certainly ought to have the right accorded to him to speak as long as he chooses. I said at the outset that I would not call the previous question until he indicated a desire on his part that I should do so.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. WHEELER. This is a very important question; none more important has been presented to the House for a long time.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ELDREDGE in the chair.) If there be no objection the gentleman's time will be extended. The Chair hears none.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that he must be mistaken as to the amount of tolls collected, unless he refers to a different page of the report from that which I have before me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked in this report of General Weitzel.

The Clerk read as follows:

The receipts of toll from the 1st of January, 1872, to that time were very light, as navigation was almost continually suspended by ice, yet from that date to August 23, 1872, (when the canal was closed for repairs,) that is, a period of about six months, $207,025.19 were collected for tolls. This sum is $26,099.79 greater than the greatest amount of toll collected in any one year (1866) previous. It is perfectly safe, I think, to assume that during the next year, if the rate of toll were continued at fifty cents per ton, the tolls collected would reach $350,000. If this be true, the rate of tolls should be fixed at about seven cents, when the canal comes into the control of the Government, in order just to pay running expenses.

Mr. KASSON. What I referred to was the fact, as this report shows, that the highest amount received in any year from tolls was $207,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all; that was for six months. The canal is now completed. We have never had any report since the completion of the canal except a partial one, which shows that in only six months $207,000 was realized from tolls.

Now one word in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] I certainly would not consent, if it could possibly be avoided, to do any act which would appreciate the value of these bonds. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly knows that during the last Congress, when we passed the act appropriating this money, the language was that the Secretary of the Treasury should take possession of the work at such time and in such manner as he might himself think proper in the interest of the United States. The object of that was that he might purchase up the bonds at the lowest possible price, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania must understand now that under this bill the widest latitude is given to the Secretary of the Treasury for the same purpose; he is to buy the bonds, if he thinks proper, in the interest of the United States; but he will not pay off, I presume, one dollar of the bonds until they become due unless he finds it to the interest of the Government to buy them. He has no right to pay off the bonds until they are due. Now the Senate bill provides that he may purchase bonds at not exceeding par value. How will the gentleman prevent the bonds from going up? They are 6 per cent. currency bonds. They are a charge on a work which realizes, at any rate, over $200,000 a year, even according to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa. How can you prevent the bonds ultimately being paid? How can you compel the holders to sell them for less than what they regard as the full value? Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania fix the price of the bonds? I wish it could be done, and would yield for any feasible proposition for that purpose.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the gentleman fix the price by preventing the Secretary of the Treasury from giving more than par value? How can you do that?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; we say he shall not pay more than their par value. I do not see that we can impose any other limitation. The gentleman must see that this debt was made by authority of the United States, by virtue of an act of Congress. Congress authorized the directors to issue these bonds, to enlarge the canal, and to tax the revenues of the canal for their payment. Those revenues are now more than ample to pay the interest on the bonds, and ultimately to pay the principal of the bonds as they become due. I am now, as I was last Congress, anxious that the Secretary of the Treasury should purchase these bonds at the lowest price; but we cannot compel the holder to take less than their par value.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman inform the House—he is a fair man, and we want correct information—what was the market value of the bonds before the passage of the act of last Congress?

Mr. HOLMAN. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury says that they were in the market, I think, at ninety-one cents on the dollar. The president of this company so reported to the Secretary. My recollection of the report of General Weitzel is that they were less. We do not provide for the payment of a dollar of the bonds before they become due except by way of purchase. We authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase them in at a sum not exceeding their par value. Can the gentleman make any other provision on that subject? Can he say that they shall be bought in for sixty or seventy cents, when these parties hold the bonds by our authority?

Mr. CONGER. The interest has always been paid up on these bonds; they have never depreciated from a lack of payment of interest.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not; and I am glad my friend has called attention to that fact. This report shows that the interest has always been paid. They were issued under our authority, and the precaution, on the part of the Senate, in saying that if the Secretary of the Treasury buys them he shall not pay more than their par value, seems to me to be a wise precaution. I do not see anything else that can be done. If any gentleman can show me any mode in which to prevent the appreciation of the bonds beyond what has been the market price I shall very cordially act in co-operation with him to secure that result.

I think that I indicated sufficient caution in the last session of Congress upon this subject, when, in drawing up the section that the House adopted and which afterwards became a law, it was provided that the Secretary of War should use his own discretion as to the time and manner of exercising the powers under that provision, so that there could be no construction of the act compelling him to pay these bonds before they were due and thus appreciate their value.

Mr. KASSON. With the permission of the gentleman I wish to call his attention to a point which I am sure he will regard as important.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ELDREDGE in the chair.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KASSON, His time was extended for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That time has expired also.

Mr. KASSON. I hope he will be allowed five or ten minutes more.

Mr. WHEELER. I think it is due to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] from the House that he should not be restricted. He has been generous enough to give away pretty much all his time to others.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think ten minutes will be sufficient.

No objection was made, and the time was extended accordingly.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to a point which I have no doubt he will regard as important. It is in no spirit at all of antagonism to the principal object of the bill, to free this canal from taxation, that I call attention to this subject. The act of last year provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized and directed to assume on behalf of the United States the control and management of said canal in conformity with the terms of the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky approved March 28, 1872. That joint resolution contains these among other provisions: that the Government of the United States shall not levy tolls, &c., except such as may be necessary to keep the canal in repair, &c.; second, that the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as it may think proper, so as not to interfere with the navigation of the canal; third, that the title and possession of the United States shall not interfere with the general police power of the State over the territory of the canal, but the State may still establish police regulations for the territory covered by the canal. Then the city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal, with the exception of mud and garbage; everything else may be drained into it. And fifth, the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the parties living there.

Now, what I desire to say is that the bill now before us in its first clause perpetuates the legislation of last session without saving anything. That legislation of last Congress authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to take possession of this canal under the joint resolution of Kentucky of 1872. We do not therefore escape it by saying that we will take possession under the legislation of Kentucky of 1844; because in perpetuating the legislation of Congress of last year we perpetuate that clause with all the conditions I have indicated. That is an important point.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would be very important if the gentleman was correct. If he will examine more closely the first section of this bill he will see that it does not perpetuate the legislation of last year except to continue the appropriations. We should not accept the joint resolution of Kentucky of March, 1872. Our rights were already complete. As the gentleman knows General Weitzel reported to the Secretary of War, and he to Congress, that the conditions imposed by that joint resolution of 1872 were entirely satisfactory. The gentleman is aware of that fact, and that we acted on the best information we had on that subject. The Secretary of War recommended the report of General Weitzel to Congress.

When we discovered that this joint resolution of 1872, which was referred to in the legislation of last year, might receive a construction that might impair the rights of the Government, we simply determined to abandon it, and to take possession of this work under the powers originally granted to the United States by the Legislature of Kentucky, when the Government entered upon the work of paying off or rather buying up this stock as it did in 1842 and 1844, and which was completed in 1855. The gentleman will see by reference to the first section of this bill that we do not perpetuate the legislation of last year except as to the appropriation. It simply places in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the money necessary to buy up these bonds at a discount from year to year before they become due, or pay them when due; that is all. It simply perpetuates the appropriation, not the legislation itself. The Government did not take possession of the law of last session; did it?

Mr. KASSON. I suppose the Government is not now in possession. We can get at this point easier by conversation than otherwise. The act of last Congress appropriates money with the accompanying clause to which I have referred, "and the sum of money necessary to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry this provision into effect is appropriated;" that is to say, to take possession under the terms of that joint resolution of 1872. And I will add that the bill now under consideration does not contain any repealing clause. The result, therefore, is that this bill continues the appropriation with the accompanying conditions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the gentleman too technical?

Mr. KASSON. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill simply provides "that the appropriation so made," &c. What was the appropriation? A sum necessary to pay off or buy up these bonds.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Nothing is continued in force but the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; and the gentleman will notice that by the express terms of this bill we assert the right, and direct action upon it, to take possession of this work under the act of Kentucky, of February 21, 1844. And no gentleman who has examined that act can doubt the completeness of the surrender; and it is the only legitimate surrender of the jurisdiction of Kentucky over this canal. That State said to us, "If the General Government will buy up that stock, and become the owner of this canal, we will surrender the jurisdiction." The Government itself entered upon the work of buying up the stock; it now has bought it up; and therefore has a right to claim the full benefit of the act of 1844.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Ninety-nine hundred and ninety-five shares were bought under that act of 1844; only five shares remained; and as to those five, the Government continued to have the right to buy them, because time does not run against the Government. The Government has the right to buy them at any time. This bill simply proposes that the Government shall now take those other five shares under the act of 1844, thus obtaining from the State of Kentucky a complete cession of all claim of jurisdiction. Thus the title of the Government will be complete. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to the fact, of which I am reminded by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CLEMENTS,] that we have paid out of the Treasury of the United States for the completion of the Des Moines Rapids Canal $2,544,560.53, while for the completion of the work now in question we appropriated by this bill $1,172,000, and have expended in completing the canal, since 1868, $1,278,000. The gentleman will discover that he is mistaken in saying that the Louisville and Portland Canal is to cost more when this debt is paid off than the Des Moines Rapids Canal. Yet the gentleman would not consent, nor would I, that the commerce of the Upper Mississippi River should be taxed to refund to the Government the money that has been thus expended. Yet that is the effect of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. KASSON. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman proposes that these burdens shall remain upon commerce until the exactions upon it shall extinguish the debt created by the authority of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. Not quite that. And if the gentleman will turn to page 14 of his report he will find that there has been appropriated by Congress for the enlargement of this canal, in addition to the purchase of the stock, $1,278,200. Add this amount to the amount of the bonds, and add also the amount paid for stock, and it makes this short canal, I think, more expensive than the fourteen miles of the Des Moines Rapids improvement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent the facts.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly not.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been refunded of the money paid out by the Government $24,278, and this is shown in the committee's report. This much went into the Treasury over and above the sum expended in the purchase of the shares of stock originally purchased by the United States.

Mr. KASSON. To what page of the report does the gentleman refer?

Mr. KASSON. I read from page 14. It there appears that the sums appropriated by the United States at different times to complete the enlargement of the canal amount to $1,278,200.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is correct. There is one fact which I ask the gentleman to observe. The Government in the first place, in 1825, paid $100,000 for stock in this canal; and in 1829, $133,500, making in the aggregate $233,500. Now, between the years 1834 and 1841 there was paid back in the Treasury of the Government $257,778, leaving an actual profit to the Government on this stock transaction of over $24,278.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the gentleman may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would remark that gentlemen representing constituencies for the benefit of whom important and valuable works of improvement have been constructed, water-channels connecting our great lakes and furnishing proper facilities for the commerce of the Upper Mississippi, and the sea-board, and the great rivers of New York, where millions upon millions have been expended, should not ask now that the commerce of the Ohio River should bear a tax which no other section of the country has ever borne. That is the point of my argument.

I only ask for the West equal rights with the other sections of the Union, and that Congress shall treat as fairly, as magnanimously, the commerce of the Ohio River as it has other sections of the Union. This canal affects not only the commerce of the Ohio but of all the great rivers of the West. The East should consider that our western interests in commerce are entitled to the same consideration as theirs. My friend from New York should remember that we are appropriating now, and have been, vast sums of money for the improvement of the natural channels of the sections of the Union he represents; and I am certain he cannot consent that our western interests should be oppressed by an invidious discrimination against us. We are none of us complaining about the policy of the Government toward the East. Our people have been very patient in bearing taxation for the purpose of improving these water-channels of the East, and we only ask equal-handed justice.

We ask that after our commerce has for so many years borne this oppressive taxation, such as no other section has borne, it shall now cease, and that it shall not be obliged still longer to bear it upon the shadowy assumption that the Government of the United States has not acquired complete jurisdiction over this work, when for at least thirty years the Government has acted upon an unquestioned cession of jurisdiction, and for nineteen years every Secretary of the Treasury you have had (except Mr. Cobb, who denied the power of the Government to own any work of internal improvement) has recognized this work as the property of the United States, especially since the completion of the purchase of this stock in 1855. Until a recent day the Government has done all that has been done to control this work, and has directed the application of its revenues until within the last few years. And it cannot be denied that this canal is now, in fact and law, the property of the United States.

I am conscious that I should not consume further time; and yet I desire to say a word further in reply to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he has any objection to allowing me to offer, so that it may be pending after the previous question is ordered, an amendment changing the rate of tonnage as provided in the third section of the bill, so as to make the rate twenty cents per ton on steam-vessels and ten cents per ton on other vessels?

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not object to that amendment being offered.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I desire to have it pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] will bear in mind that the whole of that vast region of country bordering on the Ohio and Lower Mississippi is supplied through this Louisville and Portland Canal with coal. You authorized the construction of a bridge in 1864 across the Ohio River at the entrance of these falls. Gentlemen know very well that by our action the navigation of that river has been materially affected. I did at that time what I could to prevent the passage of that bill. Congress, however, passed the act authorizing the construction of that bridge, and now we are told the use of the canal has become the more imperative. Do the gentlemen think the farmers of that country in shipping the products of their labor, and the miners of Pennsylvania and Virginia in shipping coal, ought to pay a duty of more than ten cents a ton on each boat which passes through that channel unless clearly necessary to meet the expenses of the canal?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The purpose of my amendment is simply to provide a sum equal to what will be required for repairs and running expenses. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say that in his judgment a large tonnage tax is not necessary for that purpose, but so far as I am able to judge from this report of General Weitzel it must be necessary. In fact the law passed in 1873, approved March 3, provided that the tonnage tax should be twenty-five cents. The toll then was twenty-five cents per ton, and this bill proposes to reduce it much below that amount. As this is in some sense a re-enactment of that law, we ought to have some reasonable expectation that the receipts from tolls will meet the running expenses of the canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to the gentleman's offering his amendment, but I will say to him that the report of General Weitzel, whose intelligence, capacity, and integrity everybody concedes, shows that a tonnage tax of seven cents will be sufficient. This bill, however, provides for a tonnage tax of ten cents. We are willing that it should be that sum, and if found insufficient we must consent to the necessary increase.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It has occurred to me that the figures given do not warrant so agreeable an anticipation as that which is entertained by the gentleman from Indiana. I have no objection, however, to the bill being perfected before a vote is taken on it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to a vote being taken on the gentleman's amendment,

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman does not object, then, to having my amendment offered and pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course not. I will not occupy the time of the House longer, and thank the House for this patient hearing after so tedious a discussion.

Mr. WHEELER. I now demand the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont coming in to be voted on?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not; I leave that to the gentleman from Indiana entirely.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] is entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. WHEELER. As I do not feel quite well this evening I would prefer to close the debate in the morning. If the House prefers it I will go on to-night.

Mr. COX. I ask my colleague to yield to me for the purpose of making a motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the effect of the previous question being seconded and the main question ordered?

The SPEAKER. This will come up as the first business in order after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning.

Mr. NEGLEY. What then becomes of the bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining?

The SPEAKER. That will be crowded over to the next day, because at half-past one o'clock the currency bill will come up by special assignment.

Mr. NEGLEY. Is not the bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining in the same situation precisely as this bill, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered? And that being so, does not the bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining take precedence of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining is in the morning hour. The pending bill will go over as unfinished business, and will be first acted on.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn made by the gentleman from New York, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill, and to move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

It is a bill (H. R. No. —) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876.

The bill was read. It provides that all articles imported for the sole purpose of exhibition for the international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia in the year 1876, shall be admitted without the payment of duties, or of customs fees or charges, under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; provided all such articles as shall be sold in the United States, or withdrawn for consumption therein at any time after such importation, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed on like articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation; and provided further, if any goods or articles imported under the provisions of the act shall be withdrawn for consumption, or shall be sold without payment of duty as required by law, all the penalties prescribed by the revenue laws shall be applied and enforced against such articles, and against the persons who may be guilty of such withdrawal or sale.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to suggest that the word "international" be substituted by the word "centennial," and then I think there will be no objection to this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. It is reported from the Committee on Ways and Means in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I refer to the word "international." I do not think the House is willing to indorse that in an incidental way. If it be so, let us make it so.

Mr. KELLEY. The House is not required to indorse it. It is in pursuance of two acts of Congress, one of which provides that such regulation shall be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that. But where has Congress named this an "international" exhibition?

Mr. KELLEY. In the title to the first act. It is an act to provide for an international exhibition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I ask that the rules be suspended, and that the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done in the present condition of business, the previous question now operating on the bill in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there not a motion to adjourn pending?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. CLYMER. I enter the motion to reconsider.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that Mr. MCCREERY had been appointed one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, in place of Mr. STEVENSON, absent.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 31, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of Joseph Wilson, praying compensation for mules captured from him and reimbursement for expenses incurred in recapturing a portion of them, which he was to furnish the United States under a contract with the Quartermaster-General, dated July 2, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of 7,276 citizens of California, reciting that the crime, violence, immorality, poverty, and domestic misery which so direfully afflict this fair country, are nearly all directly attributable to the use of intoxicating drinks, the sale of which is sanctioned and licensed by the Government; that the taxes and losses entailed upon the people by the use of these drinks are universally recognized to be many times greater than all the revenues derived from them; that the use of these drinks is mostly, if not wholly, due to the public temptations afforded by their public sale; that this traffic maintains in our midst a practical civil war; it diverts our citizens from their industrial pursuits, trains them in vice, and sends them forth an army of criminals, to overrun the land with violence, robbery, and murder, compelling us to withdraw from the ranks of the commercial and industrious classes another army of police, jailers, constables, and prison-guards to afford a very imperfect protection of life and property against the crime originated by permission of the Government, and that our prisons contain to-day, from this cause, a larger number of inmates than there were prisoners of war at any one time during the war of the rebellion, and that the liquor traffic is more costly every year in life and treasure than was any year of that war; that our people, our sons, and our daughters, are in constant peril from the destructive, demoralizing influences generated and sustained by ahe public drinking bars, and our property, our homes, and our lives, are ever in imminent peril from the criminal violence and wanton caprice of men crazed and brutalized by strong drink; that these drinks, and the traffic in them, are wholly unnecessary; that where they are entirely prohibited peace, order, and prosperity prevail, while crime and violence are almost entirely unknown, and jails and jailers are unnecessary; that the drinking customs and liquor traffic of America have become a national disgrace and a most serious menace to our national prosperity. Therefore they respectfully ask to be protected, as they say, in their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall prohibit the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors, to take effect on the 1st day of January, 1876.

The numerous signatures to this document are vouched for to be by the parties signing it. They comprise the names of a great many males of twenty-one years of age and over, the names of females over sixteen years of age, and of a number of persons under twenty-one and over fourteen years of age. I move the reference of this important petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I present the petition of Edward P. Rogers and 208 others, citizens and business firms of Ludington, Michigan, praying an increase of currency adequate to the demands of the business community, and stating that the West is alike suffering from such want while all commercial communities require a medium of circulation to enable commerce to flourish. In behalf of the Northwest and Southwest they ask Congress in its wisdom to pass such laws as will give them relief. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FENTON. I present the memorial of the recent convention of tax-payers of the State of South Carolina asking for relief against misrule and corruption and for protection for the rights of property. This memorial is signed by W. D. Porter, president of the convention, and by other officers and members of the convention. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1934) for the relief of Pat. O. Hawes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 344) for the relief of William Bowlin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No 345) for the relief of Alois Smith, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 468) authorizing the coinage of a twenty-cent piece of silver at the mints of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia, to report it back without amendment; and as this is a unanimous report, and it is necessary that it should be acted upon at once in order to afford the remedy sought, I ask for the reading of the bill, and for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This Mr. Simkins was the collector of the port of Norfolk, and after the place was captured by the confederate forces he paid over or deposited this money with the treasury of the State of Virginia, and receipts were given for it. Subsequently he deceased, and his bondsmen were prosecuted for the amount of the indebtedness of Mr. Simkins to the Treasury of the United States. They employed Mr. Chandler to defend the suit, who forgot all about it and made no defense. If he had been present, and had made the defense which was legitimate and proper in the case, there would have been no judgment given against them. The money, as the committee have understood by evidence exhibited before them, is now a special deposit in the treasury of the State of Virginia; the gold and silver is untouched, but the State authorities refused to pay it over to the United States upon demand having been made, for the reason that they assert that the constitution of that State prohibits them from paying any confederate debts or any debts of the so-called State government that was in existence in 1865, 1866, and 1867. Under the circumstances the Committee on Finance were unanimously of opinion that the relief sought for should be given.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not this the same case which was recently before the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think not. I do not think it has ever been in the Senate before. I am not aware of it if it has been.

Mr. CONKLING. My impression is very strong, and I think from the nod of the head of the present occupant of the chair, he concurs in my recollection, that this case was before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If so, I was not aware of it.

Mr. CONKLING. It was examined upon the question whether this money was paid over in the actual presence of force which the law would call vis major, and whether the Government had now by any instrumentality any recourse to the money alleged to be in the treasury of the State of Virginia. I forbear to state what the action of the committee was, although I can do so without any error of memory, but I suggest that the bill had better lie over until we can examine it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will not press the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects to the present consideration of the bill, and it will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth, have instructed me to report a bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth, and recommend its passage. If there be no objection I ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a written report which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 91) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa H. Hasell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of Lieutenant John Shelton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 492) authorizing the city and county of San Francisco to use the Presidio reservation as a park and highway, reported it with an amendment.

ADDITIONAL PAYMASTERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask, if there be no objection, to be permitted to call up a bill which was laid aside some time ago at my request, for the purpose of authorizing the appointment of some five or six paymasters, so that I may read the letters of the Paymaster-General and Secretary of War showing the necessity for action on some measure of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CONKLING. I make no objection to the bill being taken up to enable the Senator to say anything he may like to say; but I prefer that action on the bill be postponed until we can consider it more deliberately than we can in the morning hour. Indeed, I should like to know the conclusion to which the Senator from Illinois and the Military Committee and both Houses come touching other matters concerning the Army, before we legislate on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regards the remarks of the Senator from New York as an objection. Reports of committees are still in order. If there be none, the introduction of bills is next in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 645) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 646) to amend an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) authorizing the reappointment of Robert L. May; which was read twice by its title, and, with the petition accompanying it, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECOMMITMENT OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 2423) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of bills on the Calendar to the consideration of which objection is not made.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 171) for the benefit of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased; which had been reported by the Committee on Claims adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state in reference to that case that the Committee on Claims reported adversely by a majority of the committee. A minority of the committee, however, consisting of three, made a minority report, which is on file. A bill has passed the House and is now pending, and, if it is in order, I move that the House bill be taken up for consideration at this time.

Mr. SCOTT. I suppose there will be no objection to that. The House bill is also reported back adversely for the action of the Senate. The Senate may as well consider it now and dispose of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside, and the House bill will be proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by the bill to pay to the devisees of Asbury Dickins, deceased, $3,976.19, in full satisfaction of all claims for services by him as Acting Secretary of the Treasury, chief clerk of the Treasury, Acting Secretary of State, and chief clerk of the State Department.

Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee adverse to the bill was read the other day, when the Senate bill was under consideration, and the views of the minority of the committee will now be read.

Mr. SCOTT. The reading of the adverse report was commenced when the bill was under consideration, and cut off by the expiration of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read through.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before that is read, if it be in order, I wish to offer an amendment to the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out, in line 6, "$3,976.19," and in lieu thereof insert "$3,385.15."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The following report was submitted by Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, on the 17th of February:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 171) for the benefit of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Asbury Dickins presented his petition at the first session of the Thirty-third Congress, upon which a bill for his benefit was reported, which bill passed the Senate, and, after being favorably reported upon by the House Committee on Claims, was referred to the Court of Claims.

July 6, 1855, he presented his petition to that court, showing that he held the office of chief clerk in the Treasury Department from April 1, 1829, until August 22, 1833, and the office of chief clerk in the Department of State from August 22, 1833, until December 12, 1836; that during these years the President, under the act of May 8, 1792, (1 Stat., p. 281,) authorized him to perform the duties of Secretary of War and Secretary of State at different times when the contingencies mentioned in the act happened. He claims that he acted as Secretary of the Treasury one hundred and thirty-three days and as Secretary of State two hundred and twenty-six days. These aggregates were made up as follows:

1. As acting Secretary of the Treasury:	Days.
From April 24, 1829, to May 26, 1829, inclusive	33
From June 21, 1831, to August 7, 1831, inclusive	48
From October 18, 1831, to October 26, 1831, inclusive	9
From March 15, 1832, to March 30, 1832, inclusive	16
From October 1, 1832, to October 10, 1832, inclusive	10
From November 8, 1832, to November 17, 1832, inclusive	10
From May 6, 1833, to May 9, 1833, inclusive	4
From May 29, 1833, to May 31, 1833, inclusive	3
Total	133

2. As acting Secretary of State:
From August 10, 1833, to August 24, 1833, inclusive	15
From November 11, 1833, to November 15, 1833, inclusive	5
From October 11, 1834, to October 31, 1834, inclusive	21
From May 2, 1835, to June 13, 1835, inclusive	43
From July 6, 1835, to July 13, 1835, inclusive	8
From August 31, 1835, to September 8, 1835, inclusive	9
From September 28, 1835, to October 19, 1835, inclusive	22
From May 19, 1836, to May 23, 1836, inclusive	5
From July 7, 1836, to August 29, 1836, inclusive	54
From September 27, 1836, to November 9, 1836, inclusive	44

Alleging that he performed during these periods the duties of chief clerk and Secretary of the respective Departments, he claimed a pro rata portion of the annual salaries allowed by law to the Secretaries, admitting that he was paid his salary as chief clerk for the whole time, except from June 21 to August 7, 1831, and that for that time he was paid as Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill passed by the Senate in the Thirty-third Congress allowed him the pro rata salaries of the Secretaries for the periods he acted as such, less the salary for the same periods as chief clerk. He was thus claiming in court the salaries of both offices for the time he alleged he had discharged the duties of both, although in his petition to Congress he had asked only the difference between the pay of chief clerk and that of the head of a Department.

The court ruled that Mr. Dickins held these offices separate from the office of chief clerk; that he held at the same time two offices; that there was no law to prohibit his doing so; that he discharged the duties of both offices and was entitled to compensation accordingly.

Excluding the time for which he was paid as Secretary of the Treasury from his demand, the claim, as presented to the accounting officers for services as Secretary of the Treasury, amounted to	$1,235 57
For services as Secretary of State	2,479 16
And adding for the period from June 21 to August 7, 1831, his salary also as chief clerk	261 46
The whole claim was	3,976 19

The court found him entitled to 85 days as Secretary of Treasury	$1,395 88
To 260 days as Secretary of State	3,693 37
And for services as chief clerk	261 46
	5,350 71

When this report from the Court of Claims was submitted to Congress, a report was made upon it (No. 94, H. R., Thirty-fourth Congress, first session,) refusing to allow it, and dissenting from the finding of the court. Without quoting from the House report we merely state that its grounds were:

1. That the mere authority to discharge temporarily the duties of Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of State under the act of 1792 did not make Mr. Dickins Secretary of these Departments respectively, for these offices were still held by the incumbents whose places he was temporarily filling, and that he therefore did not hold two offices during these periods.

2. That as he did not hold the two offices he was not entitled to the two salaries.

The case was before the Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, and Thirty-seventh Congresses without final action. It was again before the Fortieth Congress upon petition of the legatees of Mr. Dickins after his death, and passed the Senate March 13, 1868.

It is again presented by this bill for the benefit of the legatees of Mr. Dickins, asking $4,276.81 as the difference between the salary of Secretary and chief clerk. His will is not presented to enable us to determine who are the legatees named in it. But assuming that there are proper parties to receive the money, if it ought to be paid, we proceed to dispose of that question.

While the Government never pleads the bar of limitation, certainly the length of time during which parties have slept without asserting the existence of rights may be fairly considered in passing upon their justice and equity. The services for which this claim is made were rendered from 1829 to 1836. In 1836, December 12, Mr. Dickins became the Secretary of the Senate, and continued to occupy that position until July 15, 1861. We learn from his own petition that it was not until after he heard of allowances for such services having been made to his successors, Mr. Young and Mr. Fletcher Webster, that he was impressed with the justice of presenting a claim for his services, and such claim was not presented by him until the year 1849.

The payment for part of the time he served as Secretary of the Treasury would naturally suggest that if entitled by law to pay for part, he was entitled to pay for all the time he had so served, and he was during all this time in a position in which he had peculiar advantages for having his claim acted upon. But while he was thus quiet, asserting no claim, Congress passed three acts, all declaring that double salaries or extra pay ought to be forbidden in such cases. (Act of March 3, 1839, 5 Stat., 349; act August 23, 1842, sec. 2, 5 Stat., 510; act August 26, 1842, sec. 12, 5 Stat., 525.)

The same policy has been reiterated by the acts of September 30, 1850, sec. 1, 9 Stat., 542; and August 31, 1852, 10 Stat., 99.

If it be averred that the services were rendered before the passage of these acts, it may be answered that the same policy was in effect declared by the act of April 20, 1818, 3 Stat., 447. That act fixed, among others, the salaries of the clerks of the War and State Departments, and provided—

"SEC. 9. And no higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act."

If it be alleged that the President might, under the act of 1792, authorize a person not holding any office to discharge the duties of Secretary, and that he would be entitled to reasonable compensation, it may be replied that such was not understood to have been the intention of the act, nor has that been its practical application. It is believed there has been no instance, from its passage to the present time, in which the President has exercised the authority conferred upon him, by the selection of a person not then in public service, and in the public service in the very Department where the duties were to be performed. The act did not create a new office nor authorize a new appointment to an old office. It empowered the President to intrust the discharge of the duties of one office during certain contingencies to the incumbent of another office.

As Mr. Dickins rested thirteen years after the services were thus performed before claiming compensation at the rate paid the Secretaries, from which it may fairly be argued he did not consider himself entitled to make such claim; as Congress, during that time and before, had distinctly declared, and has since declared, that such claims ought not to be paid; as all applications for payment hitherto, even during the time he was one of the officers of the Senate, have been unsuccessful, this committee, after the lapse of thirty-eight years since the services were rendered, does not feel itself called upon to say that Mr. Dickins was wrong in concluding for so long a time that he had no claim or that Congress has been wrong in refusing to recognize it after he came to a contrary conclusion.

We recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the views of the minority, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL, as follows:

The minority of your committee respectfully beg leave to submit the following as their views, and their reasons for dissenting from the conclusions of the majority:

This claim is an old one, and consequently has received the close scrutiny of your committee. The petition of Asbury Dickins was originally presented to the United States Senate February 23, 1854, at the sitting of the first session of the Thirty-third Congress, and the claim, in some form, has been before nearly every Congress since that time——

Mr. MITCHELL. That minority report is rather lengthy. It was submitted by myself. I am not ambitious to have it read here, unless some member of the Senate desires to have it read, although I am perfectly willing that it should be read, because I think it is a complete answer to the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the views of the minority will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. In justice to the minority of the committee, and for the information of the Senate, I will make a brief statement in regard to this case.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Claims, and assigned to myself, and after a careful and thorough investigation of the case I arrived at the conclusion that the claim was a just one, one that these parties were entitled to, and that it ought to be paid, and I so reported to the Committee on Claims. A majority of the committee dissented from the view I took in regard to the matter, and authorized the chairman [Mr. SCOTT] to make a majority report adverse to the claim.

Mr. Asbury Dickins, while chief clerk of the Treasury Department, under eight different appointments by President Jackson acted as Secretary of the Treasury, under the eighth section of the act of Congress of May 8, 1792, entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," Statutes at Large, volume 1, 281, and which reads as follows; I ask the particular attention of the Senate to this section, because upon its construction depends the validity or invalidity of this claim:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

In pursuance of this authority of law President Jackson, as I have stated, appointed Mr. Dickins acting Secretary of the Treasury eight different times during the period that he was chief clerk of the Treasury Department. Furthermore, in pursuance of this same provision of law, President Jackson, while Mr. Asbury Dickins was chief clerk of the State Department, under ten different appointments appointed him acting Secretary of State. He filled these different appointments, serving in both capacities, as Secretary of the Treasury for one hundred and thirty-three days and as Secretary of State two hundred and twenty-six days. The claim then is at this time that he or his heirs or legatees be paid, during the time he acted as Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury, the difference between the salary he received as chief clerk and the salary of a Cabinet officer at that time.

Now, what is the objection made by the majority of the committee, as expressed in the report submitted by the chairman of the committee, to the payment of this claim? The principal objection, as I understand it, is that it was not intended that the President, under this section, should designate any person to act as Secretary of the Treasury, or as Secretary of State, unless it was some person in that particular Department holding a subordinate position in that Department; and that in such a case it was not expected that he should receive any further or additional pay than the pay he was receiving at the time for such subordinate position. I call attention to the language of the statute. I deny that such is a fair construction of the law. The language is plain, full, and unequivocal, not susceptible of any such construction. It provides in plain, positive terms "that in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department," "it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons"—not the chief clerk of the War Department, or of the State Department, not any particular clerk of either Department, but he may authorize "any person or persons" to perform the duties.

I call attention to one statement in the report of the majority for the purpose of showing that notwithstanding the fact that the chairman of the committee is always very careful in his investigations, and generally correct in his conclusions, his report in this case must necessarily in the face of the facts, in the face of the record, in the face of the law, amount to an exception to that general rule which I have just stated. He says this in that report:

> If it be alleged that the President might, under the act of 1792, authorize a person not holding any office to discharge the duties of Secretary, and that he would be entitled to reasonable compensation, it may be replied that such was not understood to have been the intention of the act, nor has that been its practical application. It is believed there has been no instance, from its passage to the present time, in which the President has exercised the authority conferred upon him, by the selection of a person not then in public service, and in the public service in the very Department where the duties were to be performed.

I desire in answer to that, and in justification and in vindication of the report of the minority in this case, to call the attention of the Senate to a very few precedents in regard to that matter.

I first call attention to the case of James Monroe, where the auditing officers of the Government paid his heirs $2,069.44 for salary from the 1st of October, 1814, to the 28th of February, 1815, for his services as acting Secretary of State during the same time that he acted and was paid as Secretary of War. Again, I ask attention to the case of Henry Dearborn. In 1801 Henry Dearborn was Secretary of War under President Jefferson, and received his pay as such. He was also acting Secretary of the Navy, a different Department, from April 1 to July 15, 1801, during which time he also received pay as Secretary of the Navy.

The report of the majority, you will observe, says that it is not believed there is any instance. I have referred to two.

Again, William Jones was paid for serving as acting Secretary of the Treasury from April 20, 1813, to February 9, 1814; and during all this time Mr. Jones was Secretary of the Navy, and received his pay as such. In the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, Mr. Southard was Secretary of the Navy, and received his pay as such, and was also part of that time acting Secretary of the Treasury, a different Department, and acting Secretary of War a portion of the time, another and a different Department, and in the printed document entitled "Receipts and Expenditures" of 1850 I find this entry: "Samuel L. Southard, deceased, late acting Secretary of the Treasury, from March 8 to July 10, 1825, inclusive, and as acting Secretary of War, from May 26 to June 2, 1828, inclusive, $2,194.91."

Four cases I have now referred to.

Again, in 1836 and 1837 Benjamin F. Butler was Attorney-General of the United States, and received his full pay as such. He was also acting Secretary of War, a different Department, from the 26th of October to the 31st of December, 1836, for which he received $1,092.40, (see page 10 of the book entitled "Receipts and Expenditures of 1836,") and from January 1 to the 13th of November, 1837, for which he received $1,200, (page 18 "Receipts and Expenditures, 1837.") Here is a case where an appointment was made of the head of one Department to act in two other Departments and made by the President of the United States, under this same identical provision of law, the eighth section of the act of the 8th of May, 1792.

Then, so far as precedents are concerned, they are abundant. But the minority report furthermore speaks of the acts of 1839 and 1842, which do prohibit by express provision the payment of double salaries; and I call the attention of the Senate to that fact. Wherefore the necessity of the act of 1839 and the act of 1842, prohibiting in express terms the payment of two salaries to the same man for the performance at the same time of the duties of two different offices, unless there was no provision of law before that time prohibiting such payment? The very fact that the law of 1839 was passed which does prohibit it in express terms is impliedly a declaration by Congress that before that time there was no such inhibition, and that where the appointment was made in pursuance of that provision of law an equitable claim, to say the least, existed against the Government of the United States that it would pay for these services what they were reasonably worth. In reference to that, the chairman of the committee says in his report that the same policy was in effect declared by the act of April 20, 1818, as was declared by the acts of March 3, 1839, and August 23, 1842, which in express terms prohibited the payment of double salaries. Not at all; not by any means, Mr. President. No such policy was declared by the act of 1811, and I will refer to that to see what it is. That act provides as follows:

> SEC. 9. * * * And no higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act.

What does that amount to? It is simply a declaration that a clerk as clerk shall receive no other or greater compensation than that provided by law; and if the effect claimed for this section properly belonged to it, there would have been no necessity for the passage of the act of 1839 which did prohibit double salaries.

Now, Mr. President, in reference to this claim, I insist that the report of the majority cannot be sustained either upon principle or upon authority; that a fair construction of the act is against it; that the precedents are all against it. But then the majority report asks, why pay this claim after thirty-nine years? I have referred to the case of Mr. Dearborn for services performed in 1801, which claim was not paid until 1849. There is a precedent in answer to that objection; and then, again, the statute of limitations does not run in favor of the Government in regard to a claim that is legitimate.

I may say again in reference to this claim, because I do not wish to take up time, that a bill for its payment has passed the Senate heretofore; it has passed the House at different times heretofore; it has been carefully considered in the House at the present session of Congress and a bill has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate. That bill provides for about $500 too much. I have given this matter careful consideration and have offered an amendment reducing the amount allowed by the House bill to the amount that is justly and equitably due from the Government of the United States to the legal heirs of Asbury Dickins. And I will say in conclusion that I am satisfied had the chairman of the Committee on Claims given this case the investigation that I have done, he never would have made the report that has been made.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I will occupy a very few minutes in calling the attention of the Senate to the principle involved in this case. If, after considering that, the Senate shall see proper to adopt the minority report, I certainly shall have no regrets. I have but discharged my duty as the chairman of the committee in making the report of the majority, concurring as I do in the views asserted in that report.

The principle involved in the decision of the case, is whether the Senate will overturn that policy which has been established by repeated acts of Congress of preventing extra pay, double pay; preventing the officers of the Departments who are detailed under the act of 1792 from setting up claims for higher salaries when they happen to be detailed from a lower position to discharge the duties for the time being of a higher position; and, sir, let me ask attention, without again repeating the facts of the case which have been stated by the Senator from Oregon, to the act of 1792, under which this claim arises. It reads thus:

> SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

Now let me call attention to the peculiar language of that act of Congress. I think the author of that act evidently had in his mind that it was necessary by some phraseology to get rid of what I think is certainly a very plausible constitutional objection to that act of Congress. It will be noted that it does not authorize the President to appoint a Secretary of War, a Secretary of the Treasury, or a Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that that be laid aside.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will be allowed to finish his remarks.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Let the bill be finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators request that the pending bill be laid aside informally to allow the Senator from Pennsylvania to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BOREMAN. It is evident that this bill cannot be disposed of. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia objects.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom,

A bill (S. No. 334) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2547) to remove from political disabilities Thomas Hardeman, jr., of Georgia.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking. The pending question is on the question submitted by the Chair. Will the Senate receive the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the fourth section of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the question exactly?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio offered an amendment which in the opinion of the Chair was out of order, being an amendment in the third degree; but he submitted the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to vote on the point of order with any reference to the question pending in the Senate; and for the purpose of avoiding that difficulty, as the question is now before the Senate as to whether my amendment is in order or not, I will propose the following as the order of the Senate, and it seems to me Senators on all sides can vote for it without regard to its effect on the pending question:

Resolved, That pending a substitute for the whole bill and a motion to strike out a section of the bill, it is in order to perfect by amendment the section proposed to be stricken out.

The Senator who occupies the chair, our President, thinks that under the construction of Rule 12 this would not be the parliamentary law; but the practice of the Senate is precisely as I have written here, and I hope this order will be adopted by unanimous consent, and that will remove the difficulty without passing upon the question of the actual construction.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator will allow me to suggest that he withhold his proposition and withdraw his point of order until this bill is settled. I would remind him that when reporting a proposition to extend the morning hour one-half hour, the Senator thought it might interrupt the progress of this bill and therefore suggested that it had better be deferred until this bill was settled. In the same spirit, I would say to the Senator from Ohio that perhaps as we have gone so far through this bill, it might be the better course to withdraw the point of order and offer this amendment to the rules when we shall have concluded the pending bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here we are perfecting a bill of great importance. I assert my right as a member of the Senate to offer an amendment; and that right is denied me, for the first time I believe in the history of the Government. I do not want to see the Senate overrule the usages of the Senate, on account of a narrow, strict construction of a rule, in the consideration of a bill of this importance. In other words, I do not want to see a majority of the Senate, whatever they may think about a particular measure, override the usages of the Senate in the passage of the bill. I insist upon my right to offer this amendment. If a majority of the Senate say I have no right to do it, I submit as a matter of course; but it will be the first time in the history of this Government that the right to make a similar motion has been denied. I do not think a majority desire to do this. I do not think a majority desire to prevent the same course being pursued in the consideration of this bill that has been pursued in times past in the midst of great party excitement and excitement of all kinds. Therefore I cannot waive what I take to be my right to offer this amendment. If I am overruled by the Senate, and the Senate decide that under the rules as they stand I cannot offer it, I must submit, as a matter of course; but I do not think that is the best course. I think the best way is for the Senate simply, without reference to the pending question, to say what is the rule, and what is the practice and usage of the Senate, and give to the friends of this bill the same rights that have always been extended in all cases heretofore in perfecting a bill pending before the Senate.

I make these remarks with perfect kindness to the Presiding Officer who has made a different ruling. His ruling is based upon a strict construction of the twelfth rule. Now I wish simply to assert, in the form of a motion, that the usage of the Senate, the practice of the Senate in the construction of that rule, has been different, whatever may be the grammatical, or logical, or strict construction of the rule. I will not put it in this form, but will simply ask the Senate to pass on the pending point; but I think, to relieve all question about the pending question, it would be better to put it in the form of a construction of the rule, so that it may be operative in the future. If it is in order I will so submit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It requires general consent, or the postponement of the pending bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not ask the postponement of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks unanimous consent to submit the order which has been read. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not rise in the spirit of objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I merely wish to state that on the first impression I was inclined to the view taken by the chairman of the Committee on Finance; but upon the statement that the practice of the Senate had been otherwise, I immediately deferred to that practice. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, with the statement from the Chair that such had been the practice of the Senate, whether in the midst of this measure, since we have gone on so far under that former practice, it would not be better that we should continue throughout the bill, and thus preserve the harmony of ruling. To interpose in the midst of this bill to change the ruling, would seem incongruous, to say the least.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does my friend, the Senator from Michigan, say that the ruling now made on this bill has been the practice of the Senate?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It was so stated from the Chair, as I understood; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator can show me a case in the parliamentary history of this Government where a motion to amend a section proposed to be stricken out has been denied, I will give up.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ground my statement, as I said, upon what was admitted to be the practice of the Senate, and I am always ready to defer to the practice.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, the occupant of the chair said he understood the practice of the Senate to be different, but he regarded himself as an officer of the Senate bound to administer the rule laid down.

Mr. CONKLING. He said no such point had ever been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. He said no such point had ever been made, but he considered himself bound by the language of the rule. He said that he saw the inconvenience of the rule, but he said that the point of order had never been made before. I assure the Senator from Michigan that I have inquired of those who are familiar with points of order in both Houses; I have not examined the cases myself; but I am assured that in the ordinary practice of the Senate it has been the uniform custom to allow motions to amend first to be made. Upon that point I appeal to and ask the statement of the rule by the gentleman who now occupies the chair, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who for four years presided over the deliberations of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. My recollection was that the Chair stated that such had been the practice of the Senate, but I may be mistaken; and it was fortified by the statement of the Chair that he had examined the subject, and I remember there were several authorities upon the desk, to which the President pro tempore referred, and he stated that he was clearer than he was before, after having given thorough examination to the case. However, the President pro tempore is on the floor of the Senate and can speak for himself.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask the attention of the Senate for a few minutes upon this subject. I understand the question now submitted to the Senate to be the same as was submitted to the Chair when a point of order was raised. I submit that the Senate should not in this form amend its rules or violate them. The rules which are contained in the book [holding up the book of rules] are the rules of the Senate, not the rules of the Chair; and it is simply the duty of the Chair to declare and enforce them. The question is whether under the rules of the Senate an amendment such as is offered by the Senator from Ohio can be received. The Chair, instead of disposing of that question, having ruled upon it before, submitted it to the Senate; and the Senate is now to determine not whether it will amend the rule, but whether the Senator from Ohio is entitled to introduce his amendment in the present status of this bill.

One word in regard to what is said to have been the practice of the Senate. Of course I have been here but a short time. When the Senator from Ohio says the practice has been so and so, I accept his statement of it; but the Chair called upon to rule on a point of order must be governed by the rule and cannot know, and knowing cannot be governed by, the practice. I remember an instance illustrating this very well at our short session in 1873. My colleague [Mr. HOWE] offered certain memorials which were addressed to the two Houses of Congress, at the extra session of the Senate. Their reception was objected to, and the Chair ruling them out of order, the Senator appealed from the ruling of the Chair. The Senate sustained the ruling. On the following morning, my colleague came in and presented a pile of Journals, showing some eleven or twelve precedents for the very motion which he made, and added:

If precedents could establish anything, it seems to me these precedents must have settled the propriety of receiving petitions.

To that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] replied as follows:

It was done by unanimous consent, without objection. By that kind of logic I can show that there are no rules in the Senate at all, because every rule of the Senate has been violated by unanimous consent. Unless the point was made, I insist that a precedent was not established by the Senate, because every rule has been violated. There is no rule on the whole list but what has been waived over and over again by unanimous consent; but that does not establish what the rule is.

Now, I understand that to be a sound statement of a principle of law applicable to our practice here. The mere fact that the practice has been one way, and from its convenience has passed by unanimous consent for years, settles nothing as to what is the proper construction of this rule. It simply shows that by unanimous consent the rule has been waived, and that the practice is to waive it. That may all be so; I accept the statement of older Senators that it is so, but no instance is referred to, and on examination I am unable to find, and the Clerk has searched and is unable to find, any instance in which the point of order has been made, and if no such instance can be found, then I quote the Senator from Ohio, and I quote his sound doctrine, too, that the mere practice, unquestioned, without the point of order raised upon it, practice without a decision either of the Chair or of the Senate, settles nothing; and, as he says, if you can refer to practice to show what a rule means, you can wipe out every rule in this volume, for there is not one that has not been waived over and over again. On the question to which I have referred, the reception of these petitions, although my colleague presented eleven instances in which they had been received, going through a series of years, yet on the point of order being raised, the question "Shall they be received?" being put, the Senate rejected the petitions by a vote of 32 to 24. Now what becomes of the argument based upon the practice?

One word upon this rule, which seems to me so plain that no two lawyers can differ about it. I know very well how difficult it is for a lawyer who has been accustomed to a particular course of practice in court to believe that the law is not as he has seen the practice; and it is equally so with Senators. When a thing has been done in this body for a great many years it is almost impossible to satisfy Senators that it has not been done according to rule. But it seems to me that on the rule itself there is no ground for doubt.

In the first place, no Senator will question that a motion to strike out and insert is a motion to amend. That will not be questioned by anybody. It is classed in the books under the head of amendments; it is one of the most important kind of amendments; it is classified as such in every book that treats of the subject. It is therefore an amendment in the first degree. By the general parliamentary law that motion when submitted is regarded as two motions made at once, and is put to the body as two motions, first putting the question, shall the portion proposed to be stricken out stand as a part of the bill? and if that is settled in the affirmative that ends the question. If settled the other way, then the question is, shall the part proposed to be inserted? And those are two questions. I have no doubt that in a legislative body where such was the rule the part to be stricken out could be amended, and the part to be inserted could be amended, and perhaps you could have an amendment to an amendment in both cases; but this rule of the Senate declares in words that on a motion to strike out and insert it shall not be in order to move for a division of the question. What is the meaning of this? The parliamentary law is, not that you may move a division, but that it is making two motions, and they put by the Chair as separate motions; and one writer says it is regarded as two motions made at once.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. If by parliamentary law a motion to strike out and insert is two motions, two divisible motions, two amendments, one to strike out and the other to insert, then according to parliamentary law, pending that double motion or those two motions, it would not be in order to amend the text; and yet by the parliamentary law it is always in order to amend the text. By parliamentary law but two amendments can be pending at the same time, and if this motion, being a compound or double motion, exhausts the order of amendments, then how is it possible under parliamentary law to amend the text? And yet by the plain declaration of parliamentary law it is always in order to amend the text proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. CARPENTER. That depends upon what the Senator means by the text. If he means the part to be stricken out, that is one thing; if he means another part of the bill, that is another thing altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean the part proposed to be stricken out. How is it in order, then, by parliamentary law, to move to amend that which is proposed to be stricken out when the motion itself is, according to the Senator, a compound motion and exhausts the power to amend?

Mr. CARPENTER. The motion is not a compound motion, I maintain, but is one motion; and the Senator asks how it can be divisible. It is one motion under this rule, and you can move to amend a motion to amend but once.

Mr. SHERMAN. I spoke of the parliamentary law.

Mr. CARPENTER. The parliamentary law, as I understand it, makes two propositions of what we call one. When a motion like this is made, the Chair in the House of Commons would say, "Two motions have been made, one to strike out, the other to insert some substitute."

Mr. SHERMAN. That would cut off all other amendments, according to your theory.

Mr. CARPENTER. The parliamentary law happens to be exactly the other way. I am not answerable for the faults of parliamentary law; I am not the author of it, I am only one of its students.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have a categorical answer to this question: If according to parliamentary law the motion to strike out and insert be considered as two amendments, then I should like to know whether you can perfect the original bill?

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I have rarely found my honorable friend from Ohio putting a question based upon any such hypothesis as that, or so unjustified by the premises.

Mr. THURMAN. I only desire you to explain.

Mr. CARPENTER. If a Senator was allowed to make two motions; for instance, if I move to amend the bill by striking out the first section, and then, having the right to make another motion, I make my second motion, which is to strike out the last section, the last proposition is not an amendment to the first. The Senator from Ohio does not understand me to assert that by parliamentary law when a motion is authorized to strike out and insert, the motion to insert is an amendment to the motion to strike out. If such was the case the result he mentions would follow. But my astute and able friend from Ohio could not have fallen into such a blunder as that, and he could not have thought me so stupid as to announce such a proposition.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well. Then let us understand the Senator. He says that according to parliamentary law a motion to strike out and insert does not cut off a motion to amend the original text. I so understood him.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well. It is not considered two amendments or as presenting two questions so as to prevent presenting a third question by a motion to amend the original text. That is what I understand the Senator to say.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand that by parliamentary law such motion is regarded as presenting two distinct questions or propositions. It is the same as though a Senator should on one morning move a certain amendment and the next morning should move another amendment; but instead of making them at different times, on different occasions, he makes them both at once.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well. The motion to strike out and insert, then, is considered an amendment, the first amendment.

Mr. CARPENTER. The motion to strike out and insert is, apart from our rule, two motions; the first of which is a motion to strike out, and that is amendable, and the second is a motion to insert, and that is amendable, because they are separate motions; but under our rule they are not, it is but one motion, and you can amend that motion but once; otherwise, you may move an amendment in the third degree.

On a question of mathematics which does not reach beyond three units I think I can trust my judgment. If there is one thing well settled in parliamentary law it is that motions to amend cannot go beyond this: first, an amendment to the question, whatever it is; second, an amendment to the amendment. We all agree on that, do we not? There is no exception to that that I can find in any book on parliamentary practice. You have a question before you; you may move to amend it, and then you may move to amend the amendment, and then the limit is exhausted. Now here is a bill before us. The Senator from North Carolina moved to strike out and insert. Is that an amendment?

Mr. HOWE. But that does not count, they say.

Mr. CARPENTER. O! Rip Van Winkle might construe this rule upon precisely that principle; but I do not believe the Senator from Ohio can. The motion to strike out and insert is a motion to amend in the first degree. What is it if it is not a motion to amend? Can there be any question about it? If it be an amendment in the first degree, then when anybody moves to amend that proposed amendment, that is an amendment in the second degree, is it not? That motion to amend may be made at either end of the proposition. It may be made to amend the portion to be stricken out, in which case you have two proposed amendments and must come to a vote before you can perfect the substitute, or you may move to amend the substitute, in which case you have your amendment to the amendment and must vote upon it before you can entertain a motion to amend the text.

Mr. THURMAN. You cannot perfect the original text at all, then, under that motion, but must come to a vote! That follows.

Mr. CARPENTER. Of course it follows. That is what I am trying to push to the forefront of this subject. I am not trying to conceal it. That is what I assert, and I assert it by the authority of the books, and I defy the Senator to show a single authority which lays down the doctrine that a motion to strike out and insert is not an amendment in the first degree, and I defy him to show an authority that amendments may be received past the second degree. Now, here is a motion to strike out one section and insert something else. I move to amend the part to be stricken out. Is not that an amendment to the proposed amendment? Does it not change the proposition of the first motion to amend? So, on the other hand, if the motion be first made to amend the part to be inserted, you have exhausted the limit of undetermined propositions and the Senate must come to a vote.

Of course, there is in certain cases inconvenience in any rule you may establish. That the books all admit; but they say that the limit must be fixed somewhere, and every writer fixes it as I have stated. Now, without this rule I should think, and I should so decide if I were in the chair, that such a motion in substance presented two propositions, that the proposition to amend the text took precedence, and that the part to be stricken out might be amended, so that you would have two amendments, that is, a motion to strike out and a motion to amend pending, and a motion to insert and the motion to amend that motion both pending at once; those based upon the text to have precedence. I think that would be so; but where your rule provides that instead of being two propositions it shall be one, and that one a motion to amend, then the next amendment must be an amendment in the second degree; and one of two things, I submit to my friends, must be true: The motion made by the Senator from Ohio is either an amendment in the third degree, or it is an independent motion which cannot be put until the pending motion is disposed of. It must be one or the other. If it be not based upon an amendment, if it does not relate to that subject, then it is not germane to the question before the Senate, and is out of order for that reason.

But I do not put it at all upon that ground. I say that under this rule the motion to strike out and insert, being a motion to amend the bill, is an amendment in the first degree, and that any motion following that, which changes the effect of it, is an amendment in the second degree; and that any motion whatever which would again change that must be an amendment in the third degree. If it can be made out that a motion to strike out and insert is not an amendment in the first degree, that ends the question; but no man, I take it, will maintain that. It is an amendment in the first degree. Then must not any amendment which changes that proposition be an amendment in the second degree? And does not the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana in this case change the proposition pending before the Senate upon the motion of the Senator from North Carolina?

Here is your bill. The Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out the whole of it, and insert certain words. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend by striking out only a part of it. So that the question then will be, whether the Senate will strike out a part of this bill, and insert what has been moved by the Senator. Does not that change the proposition made by the two Senators? Does it not bear directly upon the subject? Is it not a third change of the proposition, or an amendment in the third degree? I can make the thing no plainer than the statement of it; but let me try it once more. Here is the bill. Here is a motion to strike out the whole bill, and insert something else.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a substitute.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is a substitute? Is it not an amendment?

Mr. SARGENT. Is it not a proposition aside from the original bill?

Mr. CARPENTER. That is what we want you to prove.

Mr. SARGENT. I have shown that to be the contemporaneous practice of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator showed that such had been the practice in many cases. It may have been the common practice. I remember numerous instances in which when we have been amending appropriation bills the predecessor of the present Vice-President, Mr. Colfax, would say to the Senate, "It is more convenient, if there be no objection, to treat the substitute as the text," and he would call for objections, and if none were made, he would then take the substitute as the bill, and then allow that to be amended in the second degree; but the very asking for objection to it was a statement of the proposition that without consent it could not be done.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me, on page 255 of Jefferson's Manual—and before reading it, the Senator will certainly admit that a motion to strike out the whole bill, and insert something else, is in the same nature as a motion to strike out a paragraph, and insert something in lieu of it—Jefferson says:

In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out.

In other words, in a question of this character, it is a question of preferred motions, which motion shall first be put. The motion to strike out is postponed until, as Jefferson says, the friends of the paragraph can make it as perfect by amendments as they can. How can they make it perfect by amendments if you take away one-half of their power to perfect it by amendments, by saying that they shall simply propose an amendment in one degree? According to parliamentary law, they are to have the power to make it as perfect as they can by whatever range of amendment is allowed by the ordinary practice of the Senate. That seems to me to be the distinction.

Mr. CARPENTER. I thank the Senator for drawing my attention to that, for it seems to me it upsets his whole theory. He is trying to rule this question under the general parliamentary law, which I say we cannot do.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me, I showed him that there was exactly a similar rule in the House of Representatives, and that the commentary upon it is taken from Jefferson's Manual, and it has been the rule and practice there for many years.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is so utterly foreign to the question I am discussing that it is out of order on this proposition; it is not germane.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CARPENTER. Let me show to my friend that that is so.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; I will listen with pleasure.

Mr. CARPENTER. Of course we are all desirous to get at what the rule is. I am just as anxious as the Senator. Here, in the first place, is a rule of the Senate which declares a certain thing. The question is, what does that rule mean? To show what this rule means, the Senator refers to what would be the law if there were no rule. To show that that is so, let me ask the attention of the Senator to the conclusion of the very paragraph which he commenced reading:

When it is proposed to amend by inserting a paragraph, or part of one, the friends of the paragraph may make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put for inserting it.

There is no question about that.

Mr. SARGENT. That is not what I read.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it is exactly what the Senator read.

Mr. SARGENT. I read this:

In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, &c.

Mr. CARPENTER. You read the wrong thing, I guess.

Mr. SARGENT. The notes of the reporter, which I have not changed, will show what I read.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will ask the reporter to read what the Senator from California did read.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator, in his anxiety on this subject, did not catch what I read.

The REPORTER, (reading from his notes.) Mr. SARGENT quoted from page 255 of Jefferson's Manual, as follows:

In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out.

Mr. SARGENT. That is what I asserted that I read.

Mr. CARPENTER. Is not that the paragraph I read?

Mr. SARGENT. You read the first part.

Mr. CARPENTER. I commenced reading your paragraph.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the reporter read what the Senator said, and see if he did not wind up the quotation he read with the words "before the question is put for inserting it."

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator understood what I meant and I understood what he meant. I understood him to assert that I was not reading the same paragraph from which he read.

Mr. SARGENT. I read the portion of the paragraph relating to the matter under discussion.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well; I will read the whole paragraph:

When it is proposed to amend by inserting a paragraph, or part of one, the friends of the paragraph may make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put for inserting it. If it be received, it cannot be amended afterward in the same stage, because the House has, on a vote, agreed to it in that form. In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put for striking it out. If on the question it be retained, it cannot be amended afterward, because a vote against striking out is equivalent to a vote agreeing to it in that form.

When it is moved to amend by striking out certain words and inserting others, the manner of stating the question is first to read the whole passage to be amended as it stands at present, then the words proposed to be struck out, next those to be inserted, and lastly the whole passage as it will be when amended. And the question, if desired, is then to be divided, and put first on striking out. If carried, it is next on inserting the words proposed. If that be lost, it may be moved to insert others.

That, of course, is all done away with by Rule 12.

Mr. SARGENT. I admit the paragraph the Senator last read is modified by Rule 12. But the one to which I called attention is not affected by it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It all illustrates what I claim, that when we are construing a rule we get no light by determining what would be the law without it. The presumption is that the rule was intended to change the law; else the rule would have been wholly unnecessary. But the Senator concedes that this Rule 12 does change the parliamentary law in at least one particular. I claim that it does in both particulars.

Now let me once more state what I understand to be the order of these propositions, and then I shall be done with the subject, entirely I hope.

Here we have a bill. One proposition before the Senate is, shall that bill pass? It is then moved to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert other words. That is an amendment; that is a first amendment or an amendment in the first degree. Now, I maintain that any motion which changes the proposition which is put before the Senate by the first motion, is an amendment to that motion, or an amendment to an amendment; and that whether the motion be to change the words to be stricken out or to change the words to be inserted, in either case the proposition made by the first motion to amend is changed. In one case it is to strike out the whole bill and insert certain words; and by the other motion, it is to strike out only a part of the bill and insert these other words. I say that is an amendment to the amendment; or it is an amendment in the second degree, and past all question mathematically and to the eyesight, it is a second amendment, whatever you call it. I think myself that the rule might well be as Senators desire to have it; and I move to amend the order which the Senator from Ohio has sent to the Chair by striking it out and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

Rule 12 shall be so amended that pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question, and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

I move that as an amendment to the order which the Senator from Ohio has moved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to the order proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. THURMAN. The only objection I have to that is my very firm belief that Rule 12 has nothing in the world to do with this question, and, therefore, does not need to be amended in any such form. I am perfectly willing to get at what is right in almost any way; but what Rule 12 has to do with the question before the Senate I confess I am wholly unable to conceive; and nobody has yet pointed out to my dullness what it has to do with it. What is the whole effect of Rule 12? Simply to make one question where otherwise there would be two. It has nothing to do with the question of what is an amendment in the second or third degree, or what are the privileges of the friends of a bill in perfecting a paragraph moved to be stricken out.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me a word at that point?

Mr. THURMAN. Right there.

Mr. CARPENTER. If you have two propositions, you may have four amendments, two to each. If you have one proposition, you can only have two amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us see what it is. Suppose this clause of Rule 12 did not exist, could there not be a motion made to strike out and insert? Certainly. The Senator says that would have been either one motion or two motions. It is a divisible motion, as I understand, by the parliamentary law; that is, it is a motion capable of being divided.

Mr. CARPENTER. The authorities say that such a motion is treated as two motions, to be put consecutively, not divisible by the order of the Senate, but two motions, and must be so put.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well; it is two motions. Then does it constitute one amendment or two amendments?

Mr. CARPENTER. Two independent amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. Then, according to the Senator's theory, and according to parliamentary law, when a motion is made to strike out and insert, you cannot make one single motion to amend the original text.

Mr. CARPENTER. I know my friend does not want to misrepresent me, and he does not want to misunderstand me. If we had a rule here which authorized a man to get up and move to amend the first section of the bill, and at the same time to make a totally independent motion directed to some other section of the bill, it would hardly be thought by any one that the motion to amend the sixth section was an amendment to his own motion to amend the first. That is all there is in this confusion. By the parliamentary law, a man can at the same instant make two independent motions; one is not an amendment to the other; the motion to insert is not an amendment to the motion to strike out; but he makes the two motions, and they are both on the table together. Either of them, I suppose, may be amended once, which would be an amendment in the second degree in each case.

Mr. THURMAN. Then take it that way; what is the effect of it? That, although there are two questions pending according to the Senator's statement, one the question of striking out and the other the question of inserting, yet treating them as one amendment, it is competent to move to amend the original text. But how competent? By moving simply one amendment, and you cannot go any further than that. Now, what has Rule 12 to do with it but to say precisely what, according to the interpretation of the Senator, is the effect of the parliamentary law itself? He says that although these are two motions which a man may submit at the same time, yet they constitute an amendment of the original text, and you may then go on, treating them as if they were one amendment, and move an amendment to perfect the original text, and then you have two questions before the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. And two amendments of each question, which is permitted in every parliamentary body; but the question here is whether you may have one question and three amendments to it.

Mr. THURMAN. Two amendments upon each question. What does the Senator mean by that? You have the original bill and you have a motion to perfect that, and then you have the substitute which is offered. What amendment is there to that?

Mr. CARPENTER. You have in the first place the original bill. Suppose you simply move to strike out three sections of it and do not move to insert anything; that is a motion to amend, is it not?

Mr. THURMAN. Assuredly.

Mr. CARPENTER. How far can you go to that? You can move to amend that amendment by striking out two, instead of three sections. Then you have to stop. Now by the parliamentary law, as I understand it, you may at the same time, if you choose, make a totally different motion, which is to strike out and insert something. That is an amendment to the bill in the first degree. Then you may move to amend that, which is an amendment to an amendment; and so you would have four amendments, because you have two questions and each may be amended twice. But when the Senate rule welds them together and says they are both one question, then the part to be stricken out is as much covered by the motion as the part to be inserted. You have therefore got but one question, and you have got one proposition to amend it, and all you can have is one more, and when the Senator from Indiana made his motion that one more was filled, the limit was exhausted.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall never get it through the head of my friend, or rather he does not see it, one or the other.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me a word.

Mr. THURMAN. Not now. I would rather conclude what I have to say.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish the Senator would yield, because the Senator from Indiana might be more successful than I am in making my point.

Mr. THURMAN. The interpretation now given to Rule 12 is certainly one that never was imagined before; but let that pass. I will not dispute about what the effect of that is. But here is the vice of the Senator's argument: he treats the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana to the original bill as an amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do that for this reason: the Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out all after the enacting clause; the Senator from Indiana says, "No; do not strike it all out; let us strike out one section." Then the question will be when the substitute is perfected, shall this substitute perfected be put in the place of this bill minus the second section? The whole difficulty with the bill may be in the second section; and if the Senator can get the second section stricken out, nobody may want to substitute anything for the rest of the bill. I am not speaking of this bill particularly, but of a case which might exist.

Mr. THURMAN. Now see how false that reasoning is. You may move to change the original text so as to prevent the substitute from being adopted, which is exactly the reason for the parliamentary rule that you may perfect the original bill. It is very true that if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana were adopted, that might affect the vote on the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina and might defeat that motion to strike out. But that is exactly the reason for the rule which allows you to perfect the original text; and it does not prove that the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is an amendment to the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina. It is no such thing. It is not in form so; and it does not have the effect of amending it at all. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina is to strike out the whole bill. If the Senator from Indiana had moved, as an amendment to that amendment, to strike out the second section and retain the rest of the bill, or to put it in a better form, if he had moved as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to strike out a particular section of the bill and retain the residue of the bill, that would be an amendment; or I will put it in this way: The Senator from North Carolina moved to strike out all after the enacting clause. Suppose the Senator from Indiana had moved to strike out the words "all after the enacting clause" and insert "section 2," that would have been an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and if that amendment prevailed and then the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina prevailed, nothing would be stricken out but section 2. But carry the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the original text, and it does not affect in the slightest degree the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, for that mays till be put and the whole bill be stricken out.

Mr. CARPENTER. But would you not be striking out something different in one case from the other? Is there no difference between striking out three sections and four sections? Is it the same proposition?

Mr. THURMAN. The very object of perfecting the text is that it may affect the motion to strike out.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then it is an amendment to it.

Mr. THURMAN. No; it is not an amendment to the motion to strike out.

Mr. CARPENTER. It changes it, but does not amend it; is that the idea?

Mr. THURMAN. It does not change the amendment at all.

Mr. CARPENTER. It changes the proposition embodied in the motion to amend in so far as it puts a different question before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. No, Mr. President; it does precisely what the parliamentary law allows; it allows you to change your bill so that the motion which has been made to strike out all after the enacting clause shall not have the strength that it would have if the bill had not been perfected; and that the Senator calls an amendment to an amendment. I put it to the Senator, suppose the amendment of the Senator from Indiana prevailed, would not the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina remain in words, and figures, and letter, to every dotting of an i and crossing of a t precisely as it is?

Mr. CARPENTER. In case the amendment of the Senator from Indiana prevails?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not by any means. Suppose, in place of the words "all after the enacting clause," he repeated the language, in the one case you have four sections repeated in words, in the other case you have three sections repeated in words; is that the same proposition?

Mr. THURMAN. The words of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, I say, will remain precisely the same. The effect may be different. The error of the Senator from Wisconsin is in treating an amendment to the original text as an amendment to an amendment that has been offered. It is no such thing; it is an amendment to a different thing. That is the error; and there is not one single thing in these authorities that says they are one and the same thing. An amendment to an amendment is one thing; and an amendment to the original text is a wholly different thing, and you cannot make an amendment to the original text an amendment to an amendment that has been offered; much less is it an amendment to a motion to strike out the whole bill and insert a substitute.

One word more and I am done. There is no reason why this matter should not be decided correctly. It has been said here by some Senators "Do not let it be decided while this bill is pending, because what is called the majority on this floor will decide it wrong in order to carry their bill." I do not believe that Senators will decide it wrong from any such unworthy motive, nor have they anything to gain by making a wrong decision. They have the majority and can make the bill what they please.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to one question. His colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] has submitted a proposition which is in the nature of a declaration of the rule. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] has submitted another proposition purporting to be an amendment of the rule. These two propositions, as I understand, arrive at the same result. Is not that the understanding of the Senate?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not think so. I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to present his order as the form in which the Senate will now decide that it is in order under the twelfth rule to receive this amendment. Mine is an amendment to the rule, which would make that in order hereafter.

Mr. MORTON. That is what I mean; they both arrive at the same result. The difference is that one is a declaration of what the rule is now, and the other purports to be an amendment of the rule; but each one will establish the rule to be the same.

Mr. CARPENTER. Hereafter.

Mr. MORTON. That is what I understand; so that after all it is now a question of etiquette more than anything else. I hope that the whole day will not be wasted upon this discussion. I see no objection to adopting the proposition presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the order submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not disposed to be tenacious about this matter, so that we accomplish the result and preserve the right of Senators to amend the part proposed to be stricken out. As to whether we have to amend the rule to do it, I am not disposed to stand upon that, though I do not think it is necessary to do that. I ask that the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin be read, that we may see exactly whether it will reach the point we desire to come at.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the order will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the twelfth rule be so amended that, pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for purposes of amendment as a question, and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that would cover the case.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall certainly assent to this form of the proposition, although I still adhere to the idea that it is not necessary.

Mr. MORTON. It reaches the point.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly it reaches the point.

Mr. MORTON. It is the quickest way of settling the question.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear the original order of the Senator from Ohio read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That pending a substitute for the whole bill and a motion to strike out a section of the bill, it is in order to perfect by amendment the section proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is accepted by the Senator from Ohio. The question is on the order as amended.

The order was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the bill which was laid aside informally, being Senate bill No. 617, to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking; and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the fourth section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw that amendment now. I only wished to preserve my rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to have that section read.

The Chief Clerk read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall be issued to national banking associations under the preceding section, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 70 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in further reduction of the volume of $382,000,000 fixed by the preceding section; and such reduction shall continue until the aggregate amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000. And for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States, of the character and description prescribed in the second section of this act, for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out that section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to say a single word in regard to this fourth section. It proposes, as fast as new national-bank notes are put into circulation, that an amount of greenbacks equal to 70 per cent. of the amount of the new bank-note circulation shall be retired and canceled until the whole volume of greenbacks is reduced to $300,000,000. It proceeds upon the theory that as new bank-note circulation goes out 30 per cent. of that amount in the form of reserve in greenbacks will be taken into the vaults of the banks; and then by retiring 70 per cent. more of greenbacks, the volume of circulation will be kept precisely the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator, without encroaching on his time, that the amount of greenbacks held in reserve by national banks is only 6 to 9 per cent., not 30 as he says; and that we expect the operation of the two sections together will be an inflation of the currency to the extent of about 21 to 23 per cent., the difference between 70 and 91 or 92.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. The law requires the national banks in certain cities to have a reserve of 25 per cent. in greenbacks for the currency they issue and a like reserve of 25 per cent. for their deposits, while the country banks must have a reserve of 15 per cent.; and the estimate is that taking the country and the city banks the reserve for currency and the reserve for deposits together amount usually to about 30 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. About 9 per cent. in currency for circulation; the balance is for deposits.

Mr. MORTON. I give my understanding about it. By retiring of greenbacks 70 per cent. of the amount of national-bank circulation put out, the volume of currency is kept the same. I have several objections to this which I think ought to be fatal to it. In the first place, it is unreasonable, and contrary to the whole theory of banking, that as fast as you increase the bank-notes you contract the medium in which those notes are to be redeemed. I ask who will bank under a new law by which as fast as national-bank notes are increased the medium in which those banks are to redeem their notes is to be contracted? The difficulty of redemption is increased as fast as the new banks are created. There is no more reason in this than there would be if, after having resumed specie payments and bank-notes were to be redeemed in coin, it was then to be provided that as fast as new banks are created a certain amount of coin should be withdrawn from circulation and placed in the vaults of the Government.

A statement was made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] very strongly, and it cannot be improved, in speaking of this very proposition some weeks ago, that it was absurd and fatal to propose that while you increase the volume of national-bank circulation you are to decrease the medium in which the bank-notes are to be redeemed; that this proposition would effectually prevent any increase of banking under it.

Another objection to it is, that it proposes to increase the interest-bearing debt; you are to take in under this proposition now $82,000,000 or $100,000,000 of greenback circulation, for which the interest-bearing bonds of the United States are to be issued.

Mr. President, I see no good that can come out of this proposition in any way at all. It is virtually nullifying what has already been the action of the Senate and the House in regard to the number of greenbacks that shall constitute the volume of that kind of currency. I hope, therefore, that this section will be stricken out. It is in the same line of policy which has been urged upon the Senate all winter, of contracting the greenback circulation.

But I want now to correct a statement made yesterday. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said yesterday that as a consequence of issuing $26,000,000 of the $44,000,000 reserve by the Secretary of the Treasury gold had gone up to 113 or 113¼. I sent to the Treasury Department this morning and I got the quotations, and I find that one year ago to-day gold was 116¾ in the city of New York; that the average price of gold for the month of March, 1873, was 115½, the average price for April, 1873, was 117⅜, the average price for May, 1873, was 117 6/10, the average price for June, 1873, was 116½. Now we are told, for the purpose of creating some alarm, that the issue of twenty-six millions of the reserve has sent up the price of gold to 113. Gold went down during the panic because there was no demand for it, because nobody wanted it. People wanted greenbacks, and notes, and bonds; nobody wanted gold; there was no demand for it, and it went down. But so far from the issue of part of the reserve by the Secretary of the Treasury having increased the premium, it has not had the weight of a feather, in my opinion, in that direction. Gold ranged from 117 to 119 all through the month of April last year, and from 117 to 119½ through the month of May last year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I move to amend this section by inserting "90" in lieu of "70" in line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the section by striking out "70" and inserting "90;" so as to make it read:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 90 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The general purpose of this section I am in favor of; but it seems to me that, as it now stands, it opens the door a little too wide for expansion. The Senator from Indiana is opposed to it, because I presume—I do not know—he is not only in favor of increasing the amount of legal-tenders, but he is in favor of increasing the amount of the national-bank notes without any limit whatever; and he objects to this section, because by increasing the national-bank notes the banks will require a larger volume of legal-tenders for purposes of redemption. That seems to imply that we are never to have anything else than legal-tenders for the purpose of redeeming national-bank bills. I suppose that it was the impression, if we were ever to approximate to a specie resumption on the part of the national banks, that they would acquire some specie; that they would hold some portion of their interest received from the Government in coin in their vaults for the purpose of ultimately redeeming their notes in coin. But the Senator from Indiana seems persistently to incline to ignore the precious metals in anything that shall occur hereafter.

I am in favor of placing this sum at 90 per cent., so as to keep the amount of irredeemable paper that is in circulation at precisely the same volume that now exists. If, therefore, the amendment I propose be adopted, we should have just as much paper in circulation when this bill goes into operation as we have now, and no more. But if the section should not be stricken out, and only 70 per cent. of the amount of new bank-notes should be retired, there would be 20 per cent. more paper out than we have at the present time.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I shall vote against the motion to strike out the fourth section with more enthusiasm than I have given any vote since this debate commenced. The Senator from Indiana is mistaken when he says that the effect of this will be to contract the paper circulation. He is either mistaken or all the arithmetics extant are mistaken. The Senator figures that 15 and 25 per cent. of greenbacks are required as a reserve to secure circulation, and 25 per cent. more to secure deposits. I was so much a stranger to that provision of law that I really did not know of its existence until it was alluded to in the early part of this debate. I did not know really until this winter that your banking law undertook to create a reserve of greenbacks to secure deposits.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only 6 per cent., I will say to the Senator, in the country, and not 15 per cent.; and but $\frac{2}{5}$ of 25 per cent. in the cities; that is to say three-fifths of the reserve may be deposited in other banks. They are practically not in greenbacks.

Mr. HOWE. I have here a statement of the condition of the banks in February last. The deposits were $540,000,000; the circulation $341,000,000. There are nearly $900,000,000 of deposits and circulation. To secure both the banks hold between one hundred and four and one hundred and five million dollars of legal-tender notes. So the Senator sees very clearly that if but 70 per cent. of the notes issued are canceled in greenbacks, you will have a larger circulation afloat after every bank is organized.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to read the law?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Ohio said it was not in greenbacks; I say it is in greenbacks. The law is:

That every association in the cities hereinafter named shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States—

That means greenbacks—

an amount equal to at least 25 per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and its deposits; and every other association shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least 15 per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and of its deposits.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now read the proviso that follows, that three-fifths may be in bank credits.

Mr. MORTON. That does not change it, because they are required to keep that in greenbacks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. The proviso says:

That three-fifths of said 15 per cent. may consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption—

Redemption in what? Greenbacks—of its circulating notes, from associations approved by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. HOWE. Is my time going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HOWE. It will not go on much longer. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I submit I am right all through.

Mr. HOWE. No matter what the law says, the practice says and the fact says that your legal-tender reserve is but about 12 per cent. of your deposits and your circulation. Now, the pretense that this works a contraction of the circulation is groundless, and we are called upon to say by the vote we give on this motion to strike out whether we ever mean to redeem the faith of the Government pledged by these legal-tender notes or not. I have said over and over again that the Senator from Indiana is perfectly right when he says we cannot pay specie for them to-day. Here is one thing that we can do, we can issue our bonds in exchange for them, and it is proposed that we shall do so; simply give our note and pay interest for the time that it runs; and we can do that to the extent proposed in this section without injuring any debtor in the country, without affecting any existing contract. The one answer that is given to this proposition, the one objection that is made to it is this: if you do not keep the greenbacks afloat to nurse your banks, your banks will not thrive! That is the objection which is urged here now to redeeming, to getting rid of these dishonored promises. I speak that once more, although I notice my friend from Indiana announced himself yesterday as pained by the opprobrious epithets which had been piled upon these notes. Mr. President, I am sorry to have pained any Senator here, specially one for whom I have so high and so unfeigned an esteem ase I have for the Senator from Indiana; but I do not care what the corporation is, what the sovereign is, or who the individual is, when he promises to do a thing and does not do it year after year, does not make an effort to do it, he is dishonored and discredited, no matter whether it is a great and free republic like this or any bank in the world; the consequence is all the same.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I think the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Wisconsin have lost sight of the theory established under the banking system. I call their attention to the fact that while we had $354,000,000 of national-bank circulation out, we also provided that there should be $356,000,000 of legal-tenders or greenbacks—substantially equal amounts. So before this effort to increase the currency, it was deemed wise that there should be outstanding as many greenbacks as there was national-bank circulation. Now, the Senate and the House have both declared that the sum of greenbacks shall be $400,000,000 instead of $356,000,000 as the maximum volume in circulation. To carry that out, upon the same principle that was before established, it is proposed by striking out this section that there shall also be an equal amount of greenbacks to the amount of national-bank circulation; for let it not be forgotten that the Senate have already declared by a majority that there shall be an increase of national-bank circulation of forty-six millions; swelling the maximum of national-bank circulation to $400,000,000. We have also declared that the greenbacks shall be $400,000,000, thus preserving the equivalent volumes of the two currencies.

This section proposes not only to reduce the greenbacks in the ratio of 70 per cent. to 100 of national-bank notes issued, but by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, in the greater ratio of 90 per cent. to 100, until the maximum shall be lessened to three hundred millions. Now, if you preserve the same relation, you must contract your national currency to three hundred millions also, making the total volume of your circulation but $600,000,000, when to-day you have a volume of over $700,000,000 without the pending legislation. I ask if it is the object of the friends of this bill, as it now stands printed, not only to contract the currency, but to interrupt and throw obstacles in the way of the facility of redemption? If this be the case, the section should stand. If it be not the case, striking out the section places it precisely upon the same relation which has heretofore been preserved.

It has been stated by several Senators that whether under free banking or otherwise there will not be an issue of national circulation of more than $50,000,000 within a year. If it is found that the increase is much larger and the relation is not preserved, there will be opportunity at some subsequent session to place some check upon the issue if deemed necessary; but until that is the case I cannot consistently comprehend, neither can it be logically affirmed, that the greenbacks must be reduced in substantial proportion to the issue of the national circulation.

There is another object in this, and I address myself now more especially to the words dropped by the Senator from Wisconsin. It is an undisputed fact that as between the two currencies the people prefer the greenbacks to the national circulation; and wherever a test has been made, the greenbacks have maintained a higher rate of value in the market than the national circulation as compared with gold. Now it is proposed to reduce that preferred currency by supplanting it with bonds of the Government drawing interest. I cannot forego the opportunity of again calling the attention of the Senate and the country to the proposition of the section which intends by contraction of the greenbacks to reduce promises to pay without interest, and place in their stead promises to pay with interest. Promises to pay in bonds are no absolute assurance that they will be paid at maturity. Failing to meet some of our maturing bonds, we provided at the opening of this session for funding them. In other words, we provided by statute for the breach of our faith on the question of payment of maturing bonds. Now it is proposed by the section to provide for the issue of $100,000,000. Shall we be prepared to pay that amount at maturity when we could not meet $20,000,000?

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator right here that the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1872 shows that at the close of business on Friday, December 27, the actual reserve of all the banks—and if I understand it the table leaves out the redemption cities—was $102,033,000, and of the redemption cities $71,496,000 in addition.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much of that was in legal-tenders?

Mr. MORTON. The law requires it all to be in legal-tenders.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The value of our bonds depends on our ability and promptness to pay, and the bonds are of no more value, with the exception of the accruing interest when promptly paid, than the greenbacks are. They are both national promises to pay, issued from the same source, with the same public credit sustaining the two. Therefore I can see no difference in regard to value, but I can see a serious difference in the added burden to the people of accruing interest. As a choice, I prefer the issue of greenbacks without interest to the issue of bonds entailing an annual amount of coin interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I must confess my amazement at hearing the statement made by the Senator from Indiana that the whole of our bank reserves was held in greenbacks. I supposed every one was familiar with the fact that while the law requires 15 per cent. on deposits and on circulation to be held as reserve in the country and 25 per cent. in the cities, much more than half of this was in the nature of bank credits which were loaned out on call in the city of New York, and were the basis of the volume of speculation which is now going on so admirably. I have here the table of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shows that on the 12th of September, 1873, three or four days before the panic broke on the country, the whole amount of the reserve in the States and Territories was $110,110,000, of which the reserve in legal-tenders was $42,279,000.

Mr. MORTON. That is, in their own vaults at home.

Mr. SHERMAN. The balance was deposited in New York and was loaned out. Not one dollar of it was in currency. It was deposited in currency and loaned out to speculators. Then in the redemption cities the whole amount of reserve required of them was $116,473,681, and of that they had in legal-tenders $50,067,935. The balance was loaned to each other. So the whole aggregate reserve of all the banks three days before the panic was between ninety-two and ninety-three million dollars of legal-tenders. The Comptroller of the Currency also states that the average reserve of legal-tenders or of money on hand held by the banks of the United States is between 11 and 12 per cent. That is also stated in his annual report. The Senator points to the law. But he read the law showing that while these banks were to maintain a certain amount of reserve, a part of that may be in deposits in other banks, and those deposits are loaned out in the ordinary course of business like any other money on deposit.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to made a suggestion right there, because we want to be right about this matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. MORTON. The three-fifths of the reserve of the country bank is the fund of the bank for redemption purposes, and although it may be loaned out by the bank to which it is sent, that is a violation of the law; and the three-fifths of the city bank reserve is the fund for redemption purposes in the redemption cities.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no violation of law. As a matter of course, when a country bank has a reserve of $25,000, $15,000 of that is sent to New York, deposited with a New York bank, and the country bank draws interest on it, and the city bank loans it to speculators to affect the market. As I mentioned the other day, I was in Cincinnati at the time the panic came. The deposits of the banks in Cincinnati were in New York and were not available. Drafts drawn on New York were not paid. The result was that their currency on hand was rapidly drawn out by their depositors and the banks suddenly collapsed. They had ample reserves in New York, but they could not get those reserves; they had been loaned out and were not available; and the consequence was that they had to suspend until they could gather in from various sources enough money to carry on their operations.

Now, the aggregate currency reserve, taking all the banks together, is between 11 and 12 per cent., varying from 10 to 12 per cent., you may say. Therefore when you issue $1,000,000 of bank-notes, it has the effect to inflate the currency to the extent of $900,000. If you issue $1,000,000 of bank circulation, about one-tenth of that sum in greenbacks would be held as a reserve for that circulation. The balance would either be sent to New York as part of their reserve, $15,000 of it, or it would be loaned at home. The result is that the issuing of $1,000,000 of national-bank notes is an inflation of the currency to the same extent that the issue of $900,000 of greenbacks would be.

Now, Mr. President, while providing for the inflation of the currency in the manner proposed by this and the preceding section, while providing for an increase and expansion of the currency, the Committee on Finance at the same time provided for improving the value of the currency by reducing the basis of redemption, and, as the Senator from Wisconsin states very properly, that is the only possible way by which you can maintain paper money at its present standard, or its present purchasable power. There are three modes of redemption. This is one, to retire the greenbacks and thus reduce the basis of redemption. Secondly, to give new uses to the notes by allowing them to be converted into bonds, and to be used in the payment of customs duties. The third way is the one proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] to accumulate coin, and to the extent that the people confide in the retention of that coin for the maintenance of specie payments it gives value to your greenbacks.

Now, sir, you have voted down two of these modes. You voted down the mode of accumulating gold; you voted down the mode of providing for the redemption of these notes in bonds; and now you propose to issue your bank currency, without any reduction whatever of the amount of greenbacks, but with an actual increase of the amount of greenbacks. While we are willing to inflate the currency under the compulsion that a majority of the Senate put us to, yet you are not willing to provide against the expansion that will inevitably follow by the increase of both kinds of paper money. That is the condition in which we are placed.

Senators must pause at some time. There is some limit. They cannot go beyond a certain tether without utter destruction. I appeal to them now to pause. They have the responsibility. Our hands are washed clear. We are no longer responsible for this measure. As it now stands I will not vote for it. I throw upon them the responsibility of making the necessary safeguards against the inflation of the currency. I shall aid them and aid every Senator here in every measure that looks to making guards against the inflation and depreciation of our paper money; but the responsibility for those guards is no longer upon us. It is with those who have defeated the mode and manner pointed out by us to prevent an inflation. They must take the responsibility. All that we can do is to aid them, and I appeal to them, as now responsible for the fate of this measure, not to lose sight of the necessity of providing for some mode of redemption. This is the simplest, easiest, and most logical way.

I did not expect this motion to strike out the fourth section. I only expected that Senators on the other side, seeing the responsibility that now rested upon them, would propose to modify it, and instead of 70 per cent. would say 50 per cent. I did not dream that in the Senate of the United States the proposition would be made and carried to increase indefinitely the amount of bank-paper money, and to increase definitely the amount of legal-tender notes. I trust that the Senate will maintain this section in some form. The amount now proposed by the Senator from Vermont is the actual amount of inflation caused by the increase of these notes 90 per cent. The amount proposed by the committee was a kind of compromise. I did not expect the Senators who are now responsible for this measure would do more than reduce it somewhat, say to 50 or 60 per cent. Even that would not be satisfactory to me; but it would at least prevent an immediate, rapid, actual inflation of both forms of paper money.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I will not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont; but as the question is made about the practical effect of the fourth section if it be permitted to stand as it is, I wish to call attention to that practical effect by the figures to show how it will operate. Suppose $100,000,000 of national-bank circulation be issued under the preceding section, the third section, and the estimate is that about $100,000,000 would be issued under it, then under the fourth section $70,000,000 of legal-tender notes would be retired. That would leave $30,000,000 of difference between the two. Now, it is alleged that when you take into consideration the reserve that is to be held upon this $100,000,000 of additional national-bank circulation, there will be a contraction of the currency. How will that be?

Let me first call attention to the fact that this $100,000,000 is to be distributed to those States which have not now a ratio of circulation equal to the State of New York. The consequence of this is that not one dollar, I presume, of this national-bank circulation would be taken by one of the redemption cities. I state that because upon examination of the circulation in the redemption cities I find that of $339,000,000 of national-bank currency outstanding on the 12th of September last, there was in the redemption cities $105,000,000; fully one-third of the whole national-bank circulation out was enjoyed by these redemption cities. Then the 25 per cent. reserve would not apply to any of this $100,000,000. It would be a 15 per cent. reserve that would have to be kept by all banks that would be organized under this section. What is the practical effect of that $15,000,000 if the whole $15,000,000 were kept?

Mr. MORTON. You mean 15 per cent.

Mr. SCOTT. I mean 15 per cent.; but I say $15,000,000 because I am speaking of a hundred millions, 15 per cent. of which would be $15,000,000. If the whole 15 per cent. were kept in the vaults of the banks thus organized, there would still be an increase of circulation to the extent of $15,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. There must be a reserve of 15 per cent. on the deposits and the currency, the Senator must bear in mind.

Mr. SCOTT. I am speaking of that. You are not going to increase the amount of deposits very much by increasing the number of banks.

Mr. MORTON. If not, they cannot live; that is all.

Mr. SCOTT. You will increase the amount of circulation. You may divide the deposits of the surplus money which now exists in the country which finds its way to the banks, but you will not increase the deposits in the proportion that you will increase the number of banks, and therefore the calculation fails, if you propose to add 15 per cent. to the line of deposits equal to the increase of the line of national-bank circulation.

But, sir, instead of the whole 15 per cent. remaining in the vaults of the banks, as has been stated, three-fifths of that may be kept in the redemption cities, and if you take three-fifths of the $15,000,000, you add $9,000,000 to the $15,000,000 and it will give you an increase of $24,000,000 of circulation, on the assumption that none of it goes to the redemption cities; and if a portion of it goes to Saint Louis, as the Senator from Ohio states would be the case, still there would be an increase of circulation of from $22,000,000 to $24,000,000 under the operation of this section in any point of view in which it can be presented.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because he more fully discloses the object of this bill taken altogether than it has been before by any member of the committee. According to his statement, there is no possible way under this bill by which the currency of the United States could be increased in excess of $30,000,000. I do not presume that the Senate at any time has understood or believed that the committee, while professing that they were willing that the currency might be increased, if a majority of the Senate was in favor of it, desired to restrict that increase to $30,000,000. I do not presume that the Senate understood that any time, unless they examined this bill very carefully. But not only does this bill restrict the increase to $30,000,000, but in all probability the increase would not exceed $15,000,000. Not only that, if you adopt this section, what is the result? You provide for a decrease to the amount of $100,000,000 of the greenbacks, as they are commonly called, in contraction, while you increase the national-bank circulation, and what else? You add to the public debt of the Government $5,000,000 of gold. That is precisely this section of the bill.

Mr. MORTON. Five million dollars per annum.

Mr. LOGAN. Five million dollars per annum; and then in six years you make the Government pay $30,000,000 in gold on interest-bearing bonds for the $30,000,000 of national-bank circulation; and thereby you equalize it, by the Government paying $30,000,000 in gold and the people have the right to $30,000,000 of national-bank currency! That is what this bill means.

Mr. MORTON. That would be to pay for it!

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly what this section means, nothing more, nothing less; and as I stated here on the floor before, every section that has been reported by the committee has had in it a payment by the Government in gold to the bondholders of this country; and somehow or other, with more tenacity than to anything else, certain Senators here cling to any provision that provides for putting gold in the bondholders' pockets and taxing the people and taking it out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. As I am in that category, I want to say by way of excuse that my reason for doing that thing is that I have been conscious for some dozen years that the Government has had this hundred millions of property, used it up and spent it, and has not returned a cent for it, and inasmuch as it cannot pay for it, I thought it might pay a little something in the way of interest.

Mr. LOGAN. A hundred millions of what property?

Mr. HOWE. A hundred millions of property represented by your unpaid promises.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, and of the forty million people in this country I have not heard of a solitary man who had a greenback that asked you to give him a 5 per cent. bond for it.

Mr. HOWE. You just offer the holders of the greenbacks the 5 per cent. bond, and if they do not take it, very well; I shall be perfectly content.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not doubt, nobody doubts that they would take it; but it is a voluntary motion on the part of certain Senators to give them an indebtedness of the Government and pay them gold interest for a thing they do not ask you for. Who is it that has been rapping at the doors all the time for you to give a 5 per cent. gold-bearing bond for greenbacks? And yet certain Senators would have you think the people were around these Halls insisting on our paying interest on the greenback currency. There is no such thing. Now is it not strange that it is impossible to get a bill of any character here unless it has a bond in it paying gold interest? I cannot understand that. It is something strange to me, and yet Senators say that they are willing, the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, says he is willing to help perfect the bill, but he does not intend to vote for it after it is perfected. That is very comforting to the Senators here who have to take the responsibility.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that the perfecting which the Senator and those who are voting with him will give to this bill will not make it perfect to me, by any means!

Mr. LOGAN. How do you know that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. LOGAN. You imagine so.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I have no doubt of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; then we will take it for granted that the Senator is committed against any bill that may be perfected in this Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; and since the Senator asks me, I will say it is because I know his opinions and I know the opinions of those with whom he is acting, and they are not in favor of increasing the value of the currency, as they are proposing to increase its amount, according to my judgment. I shall be very happy indeed, if I am able, to vote with the Senator before we get through with this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator will be able to do it, but he is not able to do it so far; and he at least indicates to us that no bill with a provision of this character in it will receive his sanction. Certain Senators are very willing to help us to perfect the bill provided we perfect it in the direction they want to go; and after we have done that, they notify us they will not vote for it, and that we must take the responsibility. That is very accommodating indeed. If Senators want to be so accommodating and they are so sure we are going to ruin this country, let us ruin it, for the country likes to be ruined in the way we are ruining it. Every few years the people would be glad to be ruined just in this way.

We do not propose, as I said last night, to flood this country with paper money, or to injure the country. We have as much interest in it as other Senators; but this fourth section, standing as it does before the country, is a proposition as I stated, for no purpose in the world except for the tax-payers of this country to pay to the bondholders in gold an equal amount, and more too, than the amount that you increase the national banking currency. Why, sir, your bonds run for ten years. Under this provision you cannot increase the currency to $30,000,000; there is no possible way of doing it; but suppose your bonds run for ten years, the interest on your bonds will be $50,000,000. The Government then pays $50,000,000 of gold interest for the redemption of the $100,000,000 in order to get $30,000,000 of circulation. That would be a nice bargain for the people of this country to make, would it not? The people of this country are asked to pay $50,000,000 in gold on a ten-year bond for the accommodation of $30,000,000 of circulation of national-bank currency. That is the request in this bill. I do not believe the people of this country want to do that. I do not believe it would be right for the people of this country to do that. I do not think it is proper in any aspect whatever.

If a section like this were put in this bill, then its defeat would be secured beyond all question. I merely make the suggestion to Senators who are in favor of the $400,000,000 provision, which has been agreed to, so far as that section is concerned, and in favor of a moderate increase of the currency, and I call their attention to this fact: If you refuse to strike out this section of the bill, and then perfect the bill with this section in it, you will find the chairman of the committee voting against your bill; you will find every one who has been voting against an increase of the currency voting against it; and you will find enough Senators who have voted for an increase voting against it to defeat the whole proposition. That is what leaving this section in the bill means.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the Senator takes his seat, I desire to know whether I misapprehend him. He states that this would be an increase of interest upon bonds to the amount of $100,000,000. I should like to know how it would take $100,000,000 to redeem $70,000,000 of greenbacks that are to be redeemed.

Mr. LOGAN. I will explain to the Senator what I mean by that. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall go on reducing greenbacks until they are reduced to $300,000,000. If they stand at $400,000,000 in the bill now and this section requires him to reduce them to $300,000,000, is not that a reduction of $100,000,000? And that is exactly what this section requires to be done. I will read it, and you will see whether I am correct or not:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 70 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in further reduction of the volume of $382,000,000 fixed by the preceding section;—

That would be $400,000,000 now, under the vote which has been taken—and such reduction shall continue until the aggregate amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000.

Now I ask if that is not a reduction of $100,000,000?

Mr. SCOTT. That is on the assumption that the $18,000,000 now in the Treasury may be issued.

Mr. LOGAN. It is on the assumption that the first section of this bill is agreed to, because it has been agreed to. It stands now as agreed to in the bill, and authorizes an issue to the amount of $400,000,000. It is upon that assumption that your section added to that reduces it to $300,000,000, which makes $100,000,000 of bonded debt, and makes an interest of $5,000,000 per annum, which on a ten-year bond amounts to $50,000,000. That is the whole of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has spoken ten minutes. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to substitute 90 for 70 per cent. in the fourth section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I desire to state that I was absent yesterday when the vote was taken on striking out the second section of the bill. I was paired with the Senator from Virginia, Mr. LEWIS, on that question. I would have voted against the motion, and I suppose he would have voted for it.

Mr. KELLY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLAYTON. I would vote for this motion, and he probably would vote against it.

Mr. WRIGHT. On this question, as on all others connected with this bill, I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS. He would probably vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RAMSEY, (after first voting in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I forgot that I was paired with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. FERRY, for to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator's vote will be withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stewart, Stockton, and Wadleigh—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Kelly, Ramsey, Stevenson, and Wright—15.

So the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, to the fourth section was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to strike out the fourth section of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 29, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and West—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Kelly, Norwood, Ramsey, Scott, Stevenson, and Wright—16.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdrew his amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer my amendment now as a substitute for section 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add at the end of the amendment of Mr. MERRIMON the following as section 3:

That so much of the twenty-second section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof; and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and so much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking, under the provisions of said act, shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation, at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions, and subject to all the limitations and restrictions, now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia now offers an amendment which will be reported.

Mr. CONKLING. Before that is reported, let us understand whether the amendment just read is a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina or in addition to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In addition to it, as the Chair understands.

Mr. MORTON. It is offered to the third section of the original bill, as I understand. Am I not right?

Mr. CONKLING. It does not so appear in the print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the status of the question, both the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina and the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. It was my amendment that was just read, as I understand, and I offer it as a substitute for section 3 of the bill. I understood the Senator from Georgia to offer his as an amendment to my amendment. Is that the understanding?

Mr. GORDON. I offer section 3 of the bill reported by the committee in lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, changed in the particulars which the Clerk will read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois to move his amendment as an amendment to the third section.

Mr. CONKLING. As a substitute for the third section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of the bill.

Mr. MORTON. And then the Senator from Georgia offers his as an amendment to that of the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is to strike out the third section of the bill and insert what has been read, and to that the Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which will now be read.

Mr. LOGAN. That is it.

Mr. MORTON. The substitute of the Senator from North Carolina has nothing to do with the question now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not at first understand the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. The Clerk will now read the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "that," in the first line of the amendment of Mr. LOGAN, and to insert:

National banking associations may be organized in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, having a less proportion of national-bank circulation than the State of Maine, according to the apportionment made upon the basis of population and wealth by the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, until each State and Territory and said District, respectively, has an amount of such bank circulation equal to such proportion of notes then outstanding in the State of Maine; and all banks organized under this section shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by the "national-currency act," approved June 3, 1864, and section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporar-yloan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONKLING, I suggest to the Senator from Georgia, as a matter of convenience in business, that he had better offer his amendment by way of perfecting the text as it stands in the bill of the committee now. His amendment is the provision as it stands in the committee's bill word for word throughout, except that "the State of Maine" is substituted for "the State of New York." Therefore the simple way would be, I submit to him, to perfect in that respect the text of the bill, and then the Senator from Illinois can offer his amendment by way of substitute, and that will bring the question between the two sections. It is rather complex to vote now this whole section which stands in the bill and which it is moved to strike out upon the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as an amendment changing only one single word, when it is so simple for the Senator to move to strike out the word "New York" and insert the word "Maine," and that gives us the whole question.

Mr. LOGAN. I think I can very easily remove this difficulty if there is any. The amendment that I offer as a substitute for the third section is free banking without restrictions except such as are in the banking law now. The Senator from Georgia offers a section which is free banking, except that it is restricted by the words "according to wealth and population now distributed to the State of Maine," putting all the other States upon an equality with the State of Maine. That restriction is all the difference there is between his section and my own.

Mr. MORTON. Maine has the lowest bank circulation of any New England State.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. That is all the difference. Finding that there are some Senators who prefer free banking with this restriction, and I being disposed, as far as I am concerned, to accommodate the matter to the views of those with whom I have been acting as much as possible, as I believe that this difference is not so great as to make it material, and that it will more surely lead to the success of the whole measure, I now accept the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois accepts the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the whole of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is simply to strike out the word "New York" and insert the word "Maine."

Mr. GORDON. That is the substance of it. I do not see any necessity for changing the form it is in now. The purpose is the same precisely.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to have the amendment reported.

Mr. GORDON. I cannot understand why the Senator from New York or the Senator from Ohio desires that I should use the words of the third section of the bill reported by the committee. The purpose is the same; the substance is the same in either case; and the Senator from Illinois accepts mine in lieu of his own amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on striking out the third section of the bill, and inserting the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, which is now accepted by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the same as a motion to strike out the word "New York" and insert the word "Maine," as I understand. I ask if there is any other difference between the two sections?

Mr. GORDON. None other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia move to strike out the words "New York" and insert the word "Maine" in the third section of the bill?

Mr. GORDON. I offer the whole section as altered by myself in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONKLING. To rescue the Senate from what it seems to me would be a very grotesque entry on its record, I will raise the question of order that it is not in order to move to strike out a section and insert the whole section in place of it except one single word. I raise the point that the effect of that motion as a parliamentary motion is to change only one word, not to strike out the whole text, but to put it all back again with the incumbrance of having it all go out and all come in again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot rule on a question of convenience. The proposition is a different one from the one pending in the bill. The words are different, and that is all that the Chair can see. The motion is in order.

Mr. FENTON. The Senator from Illinois having accepted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, is the proposition now submitted by the Senator from Georgia amendable before the vote is taken on it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is in order. The question now stands on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the third section and insert his amendment as modified. That is subject to amendment.

Mr. FENTON. The fourth section of the bill being struck out, I do not see that the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, more than that of the Senator from Illinois, provides any practical system of redemption whatever; and that we may reach an end so desirable, I beg leave to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, as follows:

That so much of section 23 of the act of June 3, 1864, as provides that national-bank notes shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment of the taxes, excises, public lands, and all other dues to the United States, and for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, is hereby repealed: Provided, That every association formed or existing under the provisions of this act shall take and receive at par, for any debt or liability to said association, any or all notes or bills issued by any association existing under and by virtue of this act, unless such notes or bills shall have been issued by an association which has failed to redeem them as required by this act.

That every association organized, and whose operations of discount and deposit are carried on at any other place than in the cities of New York, Albany, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New Orleans, Saint Louis, Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Leavenworth, and San Francisco, shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities above named nearest its location, or in the city of New York, or in both, at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par in legal-tender notes or coin; and every association organized, and whose operations of discount and deposit are carried on in either of the said cities above named, shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in the city of New York at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par in legal-tender notes or coin as aforesaid; and the Comptroller shall give public notice of the names of the associations so selected at which redemptions are to be made by the respective associations, and of any change that may be made of the association at which the notes of any association are redeemed; and the associations so selected and approved shall be entitled to receive as a compensation for the services of such redeeming agent, and the redeeming association shall be bound to pay such agent therefor, ½ of 1 per cent. on all of its circulating notes redeemed; and such redeeming agent shall have a lien on the notes redeemed for such compensation, and have a right to deduct the same therefrom before delivering them to the redeeming association, unless some other rate or mode of compensation is agreed upon by the parties. If any association shall fail either to make the selection or to redeem its notes as aforesaid, the Comptroller of the Currency shall, upon receiving satisfactory evidence thereof, appoint a receiver in the manner provided for in this act to wind up its affairs: Provided, That nothing in this section shall relieve any association from its liability to redeem its circulating notes at its own counter at par in lawful money on demand.

Mr. FENTON. As will be seen by those who have given attention to the reading of the amendment, it simply proposes a practical plan for redemption, which the amendment of the Senator from Georgia fails to do. Under the provisions of the national banking law the plan is indeed a failure, in that the national bank note currency and the legal-tenders, or United States note currency, are used for one and the same purpose.

The first sentence of this amendment proposes to divest the national-bank notes of their semi-legal-tender character, except so far as debts due to the banks. Further than that the amendment only intends to accomplish a redemption of the national-bank notes in legal-tender currency or coin. It is, in a word, the principle that was so effectual in the free-banking law of New York which was adopted in 1837, and which worked so well for more than twenty years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York to the amendment.

Mr. FENTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment provides that the national-bank notes shall not be receivable by the Government for taxes under the internal-revenue laws, and that the Government shall not be at liberty to pay them out in discharge of its debts. It proposes to depreciate the national-bank notes by law, to take from them certain functions they now have so that they will be less valuable, and everybody that has to pay taxes must go to the trouble of getting legal-tenders for that purpose, and thereby the banks are to be called upon continually for the redemption of their notes. There is great anxiety for a redeemer. If Senators were as anxious for the redemption of souls as they are for the redemption of greenbacks, this would be a very pious body indeed. [Laughter.] I see no merit in that part of this amendment. So far as it provides for free banking, I am for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would ask the Senator from New York whether he will not divide his motion. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that there is no propriety in our depreciating these national-bank notes. They will be weak enough and poor enough at the rate we are going on, without any legislation to make them any less acceptable.

Mr. FENTON. I do not admit that the effect of this amendment will be to depreciate the value of the national-bank note. It makes a distinction between the legal-tender note and the national-bank note; and to that end it would serve to call the national-bank notes into the localities in which the banks are situated, but it would not depreciate their value. They would, in other words, be returned from the redemption centers to the bank for redemption, and the effect would be to keep them nearer home. Unless there is some such arrangement as that, and which has been observed under all our banking laws hitherto, wherever they have been conducted upon any safe or sound system, I do not see how you are to establish redemption, because a national-bank note having the legal-tender character of the United States note will go wherever it goes, and will not be returned for redemption. The only object of that feature of the amendment is to secure a practical plan, not to depreciate the national banking currency. It does not do that, nor does it preclude the collection of taxes in the national banking currency, although the bank that is designated as a depository of the United States cannot make a return of such notes to the United States Treasury, nor could they do it under any other system of banking that was ever established in this country.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion? Will not the operation, as far as the paying of taxes is concerned, be this: that the tax-gatherer will take the national-bank notes, will at once turn them into the redemption agency, which redemption agency will assort them out and return them to the banks?

Mr. FENTON. Unquestionably.

Mr. MORTON. If he takes them, he takes them in violation of law.

Mr. FENTON. He does not take them in violation of law. The depository of the United States would not return them to the Treasury, but the collector of taxes may receive payment in any currency he may choose, as the collector of taxes may do under State laws.

The other portions of the amendment are only calculated to carry out this system of redemption, which is so important if we are to extend national banking as proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. PRATT. If I get the full import of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, I beg to ask him what function the national-bank notes will perform after they have been emasculated according to the mode proposed by his amendment?

Mr. FENTON. They perform the entire function of currency, and if the security upon which they are based, namely, United States bonds, is a perfect security, then they have all the requisites of a perfect currency under a redemption system.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Indiana, in his remarks recommending the striking out of that section of the bill providing for the retirement of a certain amount of greenbacks proportionate to the increase of national-bank notes, said that he wanted the greenbacks to remain in circulation for the purpose of redemption. He did not think it good policy while we were extending the national bank circulation at the same time to contract the volume of United States notes for that very reason.

The Senator showed great anxiety about the redemption of national-bank notes with greenbacks. Now I would ask him in the name of common sense what under the present system does he want greenbacks for in order to redeem national-bank notes? Is there under the national-bank law anything like redemption at all? It is a mere fancy; a mere sham; nothing else. In a panic a sudden and somewhat unreasoning distrust may seize upon the public mind; people may then imagine that national-bank notes are not as valuable as greenbacks; but looking calmly over the whole field they find that for all the purposes for which they can use a greenback they can use a national-bank note as well. Although the bank-notes are not made a legal tender in the discharge of private debts, yet being made a legal tender by law in the payment of taxes and in all things concerning the Government, they virtually are a legal tender in the discharge of private debts just as well as greenbacks.

What, then, does redemption mean under the present system? It means the redeeming of one note by another note which is just as good and no better. That is it virtually. That relation may sometimes be disturbed a little in seasons of panic, but seasons of panic cannot furnish a general rule. Now, the proposition of the Senator from New York suggests one mode of making redemption effectual. I will not say that it is the best mode. I intended once to introduce such an amendment myself, but I gave it up. Possibly some better mode may be proposed, and I hope it will come from those who have been protesting against the reduction of the volume of greenbacks on the ground that that would make redemption difficult.

What will be the effect of the repeal of that part of the national-bank act which makes national-bank notes a legal tender in the payment of taxes and Government dues? It will establish between the national-bank note and the legal-tender exactly the same relation which in specie-payment times exists between a bank-note and specie, nothing else. Specie, then, is legal tender and a bank-note is not, but the bank-note being convertible into specie goes for all the uses in which specie is employed. Is not that so? Upon what, then, does the value of the bank-note depend? Not upon a law making the bank-note a legal tender, for it is no legal tender; but it depends upon the circumstance that it is convertible into specie, and upon nothing else. When, therefore, the Senator from Indiana says by striking out that provision of our law which makes the national-bank note a legal tender in the payment of taxes you depreciate it, it is a misconception of the case. The value of the national-bank note will be exactly the same as the value of that kind of money into which the national-bank note is convertible; that is to say, as long as the national-bank note can be redeemed in greenbacks, it will be worth as much as the greenbacks, and no less. Therefore the purchasing power, the current value of the national-bank note, does not depend upon this provision of the law making it a legal tender in the payment of taxes at all. That provision may be repealed without depreciating the national-bank note in the least. It will not disturb its value as long as the national-bank note is convertible into a greenback, as long as we have an effectual system which regulates the redemption of national-bank notes with greenbacks. Therefore I think that notion that it will depreciate the national-bank currency is not based upon fact.

But it will have another consequence which I consider a very important one. National-bank notes under certain circumstances may depreciate; that is, as soon as their volume becomes too large for the requirements of the business of the country. When that limit is exceeded, the excess of national-bank notes will be turned in for redemption and will be withdrawn. When the business of the country requires more national-bank notes, then they can be set afloat again. Therefore I think that a provision like the one proposed by the Senator from New York would give to the currency that which is called flexibility, or elasticity in the best sense, for it would adapt the volume of the currency to the actual requirements of the business of the country in so far as it would oblige the national banks to withdraw a certain quantity of their notes as soon as the volume which is required for the business of the country is exceeded; while the banks would be able to keep such a quantity of notes afloat as would be just sufficient to satisfy the actual needs of the business of the country.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I could very well understand the policy of the bill, especially the section which provides for the contraction of the greenbacks to $300,000,000, as calculated to work an appreciation of the currency. That is a fair, open, and direct method looking to the appreciation of the currency of the country. I could as well understand, too, the policy of conversion into bonds by which by the addition of the gold interest accruing from year to year there might be an appreciation of the currency by such conversion. That is direct, and a little more effectual than the other, involving, as has been stated, the burden of interest. Those two propositions we could understand. They emanated from the same source, and have been advocated by the honorable Senator on my left [Mr. SCHURZ] with all his energy and pertinacity.

Now that theory is changed and we have a sort of boomerang policy. Instead of measures seeking to appreciate the currency directly, it is proposed now to depreciate the national currency in order to multiply the obstacles in the way of conversion. I can characterize it by no fitter term than "boomerang." It is striking at the value of the national currency for the avowed purpose of affecting an appreciation of the whole volume of circulation.

I say upon principles of good faith, fair and open legislation, when Senators have attempted to convert the currency into bonds and are voted down, and next attempt to contract the greenbacks and are again voted down, they should rest satisfied. But no, the proposition is submitted to prohibit the national-bank currency from being received for taxes and for other purposes, as now provided by law, in order to create an essential difference and thus separate the values of the two currencies. The effect of this would be to depreciate the one, and to create a greater demand for the other, and causing greater pressure upon the banks for the conversion of bank-notes into greenbacks.

I have no disposition to take up time in debate any more than to call attention to this sudden change of policy and to the pertinacious determination of those who are now in the minority to defeat the measures of the majority. They have volunteered the statement that they are trying to perfect the bill, and as resolutely state that they intend rolling the responsibility of results upon the majority. I say, in calmness and fairness and good faith, if we are charged with the duty of framing measures of relief and stability and are to sustain the responsibility of what is done, let it then be managed by its friends. We do not especially invite this kind of proffered aid in the way of perfecting a bill. Let us maintain the value of national-bank currency just where the law holds it to-day. You have failed to cut down the greenbacks and have failed further to induce the Senate to increase the bonded debt, so let us come squarely to the vote whether or not we shall have substantially free banking, or whether we shall have a definite increase of currency; and do not make this attempt to lessen the value of the people's money. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the running debate, said twice during the discussion of this subject that if it was an original proposition he would favor making the greenbacks a full legal tender. That I can see is in the line of an appreciation of the currency of the country. But when it is attempted now to break down the national-bank currency to a lower standard of value, I cannot understand the gentleman, and I must say it seems more like an intention to thwart the majority in their efforts to perfect what is charged they must necessarily assume. I am prepared, so far as my vote and action are concerned, to take my part of the responsibility of this question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What was the majority?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The majority on the lightest vote was more than one-half.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The majority was two votes. If my friend had voted the other way, the motion would have been lost. Now, I think we have heard enough of this brag about majorities when we are legislating.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I am not here to raise a question with the Senator from New Jersey. A majority of one is as good as one hundred, practically, upon this question. I am not bragging, only replying to the taunt, if it was meant to be such, addressed repeatedly to the majority, but not before from the Senator from New Jersey. I am not disposed to use epithets that are offensive; but it has been said that we of the majority are assuming a grave responsibility, as though we did not comprehend the gravity of public duty, and at the same time it is suggested that those who are in the minority shall help perfect what we have assumed. In what way? By objectionable amendments. I say, as a question of etiquette at least, we should have the right of perfecting the measure, the responsibility of which we are to assume and answer for to the people. Therefore I say the remark of the Senator from New Jersey is not well-timed. There is nothing of threat in anything I have said or implied. I have merely replied to the remark made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that the responsibility rolling upon the majority was a grave one. We carried the amendment, which in the judgment of the minority was our weakest one, by a majority of two. As the majority, we assume the responsibility, and will go before the country, until Congress convenes again, to test whether that responsibility is wisely taken, and shall then learn whether the measure has the support of the people. I am satisfied to appeal to them and bide their judgment. My belief is that three-fourths (and that is putting it low) of the people of the country are throbbing in sympathy with the majority here for the success of the measure, the responsibility of which we now take.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Michigan said he was not disposed to use any terms here which were not warranted by good taste, or to say anything by way of taunt. I should like to know what the Senator meant by "bullirag?" [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The trouble is that the Senator from Vermont, although near me, did not understand the words that were conveyed to his ears as I uttered them. I did not use the word "bullirag;" I used the word "boomerang;" and if the Senator will consult the lexicographer, perhaps there will be a little more light thrown upon his understanding.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think I have a few minutes more, have I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four minutes.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think the word "boomerang" is as parliamentary as anything that has been said in this debate.

Now, sir, I begin to feel that it is a somewhat unwarrantable assumption on our part to offer amendments to this bill. In fact we are given to understand that there is a degree of moral turpitude in it. I did not feel that at first, but we are told it so frequently that gradually the consciousness of guilt is creeping all over me. But, sir, we are all weak, and presumptuous in our weakness, and so we still suspect that a minority, voted down only by two, still have some rights on this floor which white men are bound to respect.

I should not have risen to speak in favor of this amendment at all had not the gentlemen of the majority, a majority of two, told us repeatedly and emphatically that they did not want to have the volume of greenbacks decreased, because it would make the redemption of national-bank notes so difficult. We show them that the redemption of the national-bank notes under the present law, as they contemplate it, is a mere farce, in fact no redemption at all. Now, the Senator from New York, [Mr. FENTON,] in due modesty, for nobody will find any assumption in his manner, came forward and did a thing which he did not suppose to have any moral turpitude in it, and which in former times it was supposed any United States Senator under his sense of responsibility had a right to do; that is to say, he offered an amendment to this bill. He offered an amendment suggesting one method by which possibly the promise given to us by the majority, that redemption should be taken care of, could be fulfilled. Now, I admit, as I said before, that may not be the best one; but if this is voted down, we may then look up to the majority with that respect, even amounting to a certain degree of admiration, and with that confidence which only the imposing display of majestic condescension can inspire, to bring forward a measure which will secure the redemption of national-bank notes into United States notes with certainty better than this. So far I have heard no such suggestion.

Mr. MORTON. Just one word. The substance of the argument on the part of the Senator from Missouri and of the Senator from New York in favor of this amendment is that the national-bank notes are so good a currency, so perfectly secure, in which there is such entire confidence, that nobody wants to convert them into greenbacks, or anything else; and therefore you must take from the national-bank notes certain functions, reduce their value, impair their usefulness, so that people will have some object in converting them into greenbacks. That is the sum and substance of it. It is the most remarkable objection against the increase of the national-bank currency that ever I have heard.

Mr. FENTON. I do not wish to protract this debate; indeed I do not care to say more than a word. The amendment explains itself. My only purpose now is to repel the assertion that the amendment operates to depreciate the value of the national-bank notes. It does no such thing. It does not depreciate the value of the national-bank note. It narrows its uses; it prevents it making the circuit that it now makes, and it compels it to return to the counter for redemption. That is all. It does not depreciate the value of the bank-note, and my friend from Michigan and my friend from Indiana, with all their knowledge on this question, ought not to make any such assertion.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my friend this question: when you diminish the usefulness of the national-bank note, diminish the purposes for which it can be used, I ask if you do not diminish its value, if you do not depreciate it?

Mr. FENTON. Not at all. You localize it and you make redemption possible, and in no other way can it be done successfully.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I rise for no other purpose than to acquit myself in the understanding of my friend from Missouri, and also my friend from New Jersey, as well as my friend from Vermont, that I have used no words here that are unparliamentary or offensive. So I will read from the dictionary the explanation of the word "boomerang" which I used:

Boomerang: a missile weapon, of a peculiar, form used by the aborigines of Australia, which if unsuccessfully hurled is liable to return and kill him who hurls it.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator does not mean to say that it was used by aborigines here. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Nor from Australia. Nor did I wish to point to the object of my use of the term, to localize (as gentlemen propose to localize this currency) the mover of the amendment, because I hold the mover of the amendment in high esteem. I do not suppose it will react and kill him, but in view of the source from which it emanates, irrespective of personality—from those who are attempting to obstruct and defeat the majority here—I say that its object is not only to strike personally, but to strike down the whole ground upon which they stand; and that is to help to perfect this bill. In attempting to perfect it, with their personality they kill the whole measure, and therefore it is unskillfully used, and will carry death with it.

Mr. FENTON. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, I think I can help him out of this complication.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I need no help from that quarter.

Mr. FENTON. The only application of the word "boomerang" in this case, as I think, is that my amendment would strike at a perpetually irredeemable and inconvertible paper currency.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That is the judgment of the Senator from New York, who happens unfortunately at this time to be in the minority, and I who happen fortunately to be in the majority am willing to go with the Senator from New York to the people and let them judge and let time judge whether the measure we have is a boomerang that kills the public interest and the industrial interest and values of the country. I leave it there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Michigan will allow me to say that the allusion I made was a sportive allusion entirely, but it would hardly be safe for him to appeal to the ears of the Senate or of the reporter to correct the word which he actually used.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask if the proposition of the Senator from New York cannot be divided? I am in favor of that part of the proposition which provides for redemption, as I understand it. I am opposed to that part of his proposition which limits the use of the national banking currency. I would like to vote for the part relating to redemption; but must vote against it if it is connected with this, as I think, depreciation of the national currency.

Mr. FENTON. We have nearly the same system of redemption under the present national banking law; but the details are better perfected in this amendment, perhaps.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think we have now the best currency that we have ever had, in one respect: it is of uniform value in every part of the country. Now, any bill that will change the value of the currency, so as to diminish it, even by an attraction in one locality making it worth a fraction more than in some other locality, will be a bill to the injury of this system of banking, in my judgment; and it is for that reason that I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Connecticut is an experienced business man. Now, if he can propose a method how to establish a system of redemption that will be efficient, that will have the effect of putting a safe limit to the issue of national bank note currency, which without such limit might run into wild inflation—if he has any such proposition to make, I should be very happy to accept it, and to vote for it. While we cannot redeem in coin, the difficulty is that we have two kinds of paper currency, equally valuable and occupying the same field of action, so that converting one into the other means redeeming it with itself. If the Senator can obviate that difficulty, I shall be happy to accept his proposition.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think when an opportunity shall present itself I can propose a plan of redemption which will meet the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, a system which will be in perfect harmony with free banking with an equal value of circulation in all sections of the country. I think one may be perfectly consistent with the other; and the plan which I shall propose is one which I have suggested before, which, although not redemption in specie, yet comes virtually to that, and will give the coin to any man who has either kind of currency at par within a fraction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] to the amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am paired on this vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Fenton, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stewart, Wadleigh, and Windom—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Thurman, and Tipton—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hager, Hamlin, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Ramsey, Stevenson, Stockton, West, and Wright—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. This amendment, I believe, is open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following: Strike out that part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia which was accepted by the Senator from Illinois, and insert what I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

On and after the 1st day of January, 1875, United States legal-tender notes, in sums of $1,000 and its multiple, shall, on demand by the holder thereof, be redeemed by the Treasurer of the United States either with coin or with United States bonds at par, as he shall elect. The principal of such bonds shall be payable in coin in ten years after the date of their issue, and shall bear interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and shall be free from State and municipal taxation.

That the principal of any United States bonds bearing interest in coin at a rate not less than 5 per cent. per annum, whether due or not, shall, on demand by the holder thereof, be paid by the Treasurer of the United States in legal-tender notes and the accrued interest in coin.

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds as herein described in denominations not less $100, and legal-tender notes in denominations not less than five dollars, and to make all rules and regulations necessary to furnish proof of the lawful issue of such bonds and notes, and for the full execution of all the provisions of this act.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I am very sorry to differ in my judgment from many members of the Senate in regard to the course which we ought to pursue in reference to our banking and currency system. It seems to me we sometimes lose sight of the object which ought to be before us. What do we need? Currency as a representative of money, not in unlimited quantities, but sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses of the individual and to pay balances which are due between one section of the country and another. We do not want any more currency than that. Now, I believe it is within the power of Congress to adopt some system which will give just that amount of currency, and when the amount goes beyond that so that it becomes a surplus it can be gathered up and retired. I think free banking is part of a system by which this can be secured.

The amendment which the Senator from Georgia proposes does not give us free banking. It gives us banking upon a certain condition, based upon the proportion of banking capital and bank currency which is now located in the State of Maine. But the State of Rhode Island may want a little more, and the State of Connecticut may want a little less; and if they are restrained or restricted by the amount located in Maine, there is not freedom. Now, I think men who understand the banking business as a manufacturer ought to understand his business might and should be permitted, if they can do it with security to the public, to locate a bank wherever they please, with such capital as they please, and manage it there so long as they can do it for their interest and the interests of the community; and when they cease to manage it in accordance with these interests let them retire and occupy some other field or no other field. A man might, under proper restrictions, be as free to engage in banking, if the necessities of the country demand it, as he would be to engage in manufacturing or in raising cotton or in wool-growing. I should like that kind of freedom.

But, Mr. President, there is a freedom to expand, and that indefinite expansion is not what I am for; but a freedom with proper restrictions, not improper, not any which are not in accordance with the interest of the public; but with restrictions. What restrictions? Simply those which will require him who issues that which purports to be money to pay it when it is wanted. We have security, but security is not payment. A mortgage is security, but a mortgage does not pay. Your bank-notes are secured better than any notes ever were before in this country, and perhaps in any other; but when my friend comes with his ten-dollar note and asks the coin for it, he does not get it. Now I want and I desire to enact some law by which he who issues his promise to pay will be restricted and brought into such limits that he will pay the coin if he can, and, if not that, then that which will come nearest to it in value. The amendment which I offer does propose that if a man will not or cannot redeem his promise in coin according to the promise, he shall do the next best thing; and that is he shall pay in a promise with interest, which he can sell to his neighbor at par or very near it. It does provide that the banker shall redeem in United States legal-tender notes, and when a man gets the legal-tender notes he may go to the Government that has promised to pay those notes and take either the coin or a promise with interest, better than the promise delayed. Why? Because the promise with interest he can sell, and it will bring him in the market more than his legal-tender note. In this way, it appears to me, there may be a system with perfect security.

I will say a single word with regard to the other proposition, which is simply interchangeability between bonds and legal-tender notes. Some speak of it as elasticity. I care not what name you give it. It is not that elasticity which is compared sometimes to stretching the yard-stick or to increasing the quantity of cubic inches in a bushel; but it is a kind of elasticity which increases the number of bushels or the number of yard-sticks all of equal length. It does not propose to stretch a dollar so as to make it worth one dollar and ten cents today and have it contract so as to be worth but ninety cents to-morrow, but it proposes that when a certain amount of business has so increased that a greater number of dollars of equal value shall be demanded to transact that business, those dollars can be obtained; and it permits the man who has the bonds or the property by which he can secure those bonds to secure a greater number of dollars.

Let me suggest another thing. All this noise about the banking system and currency is occasioned now by the embarrassment to commerce, the commercial panic which took place in New York last September and October. I ask, what provision has been suggested to relieve such a panic as that unless it be this? I ask, where has been the suggestion to relieve men who are embarrassed under such circumstances as men were then? You may put it down as certain that you can never prevent commercial embarrassment, you can never prevent men from entering into speculations or making unwise and injudicious investments, and when they make such investments they will be followed by disaster, and the speculator and gambler will sink as he ought to sink; but when he sinks, good and sound and true men are affected by his disaster; and what Congress ought to do if it can is to do something to tide over the sound men and not let them sink with the bankrupts.

I know, and I know by experience too, that the time has been when it would seem as though a man would die if he could not get more money, and he could not get it. Why? Simply because the banks were bound to maintain specie payments, and the pressure upon them was such as to drive them from that position; and then there was relief, because more money could be obtained. Now, I submit that there are times, as there were last September and October, when men worth no matter how much cannot secure the money which is necessary to meet the demands upon them. Now, I say that if they had the opportunity to increase the currency by going with bonds, and securing for those bonds promises to pay without interest, they would have been tided over, and the terrible disaster which swept so many into complete bankruptcy would not have destroyed them all, or at least not so many.

I do not know that I have anything more to say on this subject; but to me it seems as if this was the only thing which has been suggested which may possibly aid sound and good men in their business during a commercial panic. Who would be injured by it? The Government owes money. It does not pay. If there be a surplus of money, as there is in New York to-day, $80,000,000 and more of deposits than there were four months ago, at the time Congress convened; if there are no men who want that money, either in New York or in Illinois, or in any other section of the country, who will give for it more than it brings to-day, which is very little, then let those who own it go to the Government and get from the Government a promise to pay with interest, which would be a redemption. Then reverse it. Suppose next July money is wanted to move the crops from the West, or next October money is wanted to move the cotton crop from the South; if then the men who have these bonds could have the privilege of going to the Treasury of the United States and securing money that would circulate all over the grain-growing districts of the West and all over the South, it would go wherever it was demanded by the commerce of the country.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, when I interrupted the Senator from Connecticut before he offered his amendment, the amendment of the Senator from New York being then pending, I understood him to say that he was going to offer a proposition which would remedy the absence of a real system of redemption as between greenbacks and national-bank notes, while we could not redeem in coin, and while the only redemption that could be had for national-bank notes would be in greenbacks. He then replied that he would furnish such a system; but in his amendment I do not find anything of the kind. He has indeed provided that on and after the 1st day of January, 1875, United States legal-tender notes in sums of $1,000, and so on, shall on demand of the holder thereof be redeemed by the Treasurer of the United States either with coin or with United States bonds, at par, as the Treasurer shall elect.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator understands that bank-notes are redeemable now in legal-tenders.

Mr. SCHURZ. I understand; but what I was going on to say was that the condition of things upon which I base my inquiry is not the condition of things supposed here. The Senate has already virtually declared that we shall not return to specie payments, and it is useless therefore to speak of redemption with coin.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I beg leave to suggest that this, I think, is entirely different in one respect from the proposition submitted by the Committee on Finance. That proposition left it with the Secretary of the Treasury to determine whether he would or would not issue this currency. This proposition makes it obligatory on him to meet the demands of the holder of the bonds or of the currency. The proposition of the Senator from Ohio did not. It left it optional; and in that respect I think this is altogether better for the public.

Mr. SCHURZ. I was going to say that this amendment does not satisfy me with regard to the redemption of United States bank-notes with greenbacks while we do not redeem the greenbacks in specie, and while there is, as the Senator himself must know, at present no prospect of arriving at any such result.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I agree that there is no immediate prospect of it, and I offer this as a substitute, as the best thing which can be secured while there is no redemption in coin.

Mr. SCHURZ. At any rate, the difficulty I desire to provide for is not provided for in this amendment. And then I see something here which rather startles me. This amendment, as I understand it, gives the Secretary of the Treasury power, as demands may be made upon him for bonds or for currency, to increase the debt or to increase the currency indefinitely.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I beg pardon. I ask the Senator if it is any increase of the debt to exchange a greenback for a bond or a bond for a greenback?

Mr. SCHURZ. I will put it differently, then—to increase the amount of interest-bearing bonds on the one hand, or the volume of greenback currency, as demands may be made upon the Treasury, indefinitely, absolutely without limit. I cannot vote for any such proposition. There may be a degree of inflation under such a law as here proposed to which I certainly cannot give my assent.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me to say a word in regard to the possibility of inflation? That possibility depends on the interests of men. Here is a 5 per cent. bond offered or to be relinquished. I have some greenbacks in the case supposed—I wish I had; but suppose I had. I want to use them to the best advantage. If I can use them in my business, or if I can loan them to my neighbor so that he can employ them in his business at 6 or 7 or 8 per cent., I will let him have them. If I cannot use them so that they are worth to me more than 4 or 4½ per cent., I go and get the bonds. There I am controlled by my interest, and every man who holds notes will be controlled by his interest in that way and no further. Now suppose a man has his bonds and he wants to convert them into greenbacks, by which the currency would be inflated according to the idea of my friend from Missouri, which would be true; it would be an increase; but when would it be increased? Only when it would be for the interest of the holder of the bonds, he being able to get more for the currency than the interest on his bonds.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator permit me to put a question to him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THURMAN in the chair.) The time of the Senator from Connecticut is up.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I will take the floor; I do not think I have consumed my time already. I would ask the Senator from Connecticut would it not be possible under this proposition for a number of speculators in New York to get together and gather together a large quantity of bonds, say twenty-five or thirty millions, and to throw them into the Treasury and take out of the Treasury twenty-five or thirty millions of currency and dash it right into the market?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. If I may be permitted by the Senate long enough to answer that question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the Senator will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. What would be the danger then? Here are men who combine together with thirty or fifty or one hundred millions of bonds to get currency; what are they going to do with it? The Senator says throw it upon the market. If it is for their interest, they will; but they are not going to part with their money unless they can make it for their interest to do so, and they must know this, that there are other men besides these holders of thirty or fifty millions who in like manner are as watchful of their interests. I do not apprehend the least danger from any such combination or any such inflation of the currency. If it is increased it will be increased because the business interests of the country demand it, and then it should be increased.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Connecticut asks what can speculators in New York collecting together fifty or one hundred millions of bonds do with the currency when they take it out of the Treasury and hash it into the market. The answer is very simple. It is put into the power of private citizens to inflate the currency to that amount, and by so doing to derange all current values in the country. There is a field opened for speculation the like of which never was seen in the United States; and I am sure, as we know from experience the men who carry on such speculations, we have no reason to think that they will not take advantage of it to the fullest extent of possibility.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THURMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. On this question the Senator from Connecticut asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I am only going to spend a moment. I shall be compelled to vote against this amendment. I do so with great diffidence. There is no Senator on this floor in whose judgment I have more confidence than I have in the judgment of the Senator from Connecticut, and I have the same confidence in the integrity of his purposes that every Senator and every man who knows him has; but this proposition is not new to me. I have heard it in this Hall and elsewhere for years and thought upon it a good deal. My main objection to it is the objection which has been stated by the Senator from Missouri. I think it is very evident that so long as these legal-tender notes were being funded your circulation would be contracted and prices would be falling. I think when the current was reversed your currency would be inflated and prices would be enhanced.

But Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken in supposing it would relieve just such a case as he has devised it for. I do not think this provision would have given any substantial relief to the country if it had been on your statute-book last fall. We were in some such situation as that the Treasury had notes at that time which it was authorized to dispose of for bonds and tried to dispose of for bonds. I have taken a little pains to ascertain of how much avail that was to the suffering public. That crisis commenced on the 18th of September. Up to the 25th of September the Treasury had contrived to buy some $12,000,000 of bonds. Those banks were principally supplied by the savings-banks. The notes, of course, which were issued in exchange for them went into the savings-banks. They did not meet any want of the business community. Now, what do you suppose the Secretary paid for those 6 per cent. bonds at that time? One would think if the price of bonds was to be measured by the want of the country for circulating notes, bonds would have been worth about twelve shillings a bushel, for there probably never was a time when the community, from one ocean to the other, was so hungry, so eager for notes, as it was last fall. Six per cent. bonds before that crash came were worth about 115½ cents on the dollar with the coupons on. The Secretary bought the same bonds for just about 111 cents, paying the interest in coin. How much that depreciation was I cannot now state in cents, but every Senator will see it was a mere trifle. The fact was that the men who had the bonds to sell were not the men who wanted notes. They used their bonds to make the most out of them, and so I think it will always happen.

Mr. GORDON. I simply want to say, inasmuch as I had the honor of offering a proposition similar to this some weeks ago, that I am in favor of the principle of it. I simply wish to put myself on record. I am in favor of the principle of the interchangeability of the bonds and United States notes, as contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut; but inasmuch as his amendment provides for 5 per cent. bonds, which are now far above par, I am satisfied that it does not accomplish the object the Senator has in view, and I shall therefore be compelled to vote against it while I approve of the principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, which was accepted by the Senator from Illinois; and on this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. I am paired on this question with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON.] I would vote for this amendment and he would vote against it.

Mr. WADLEIGH. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, Mr. PRATT. If he were present he would vote against the amendment and I should vote for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckingham, Cooper, Cragin, Morrill of Maine, Sargent, Sherman, and Stewart—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Kelly, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Scott, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Wright—26.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] as modified at the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following amendment, to strike out as before and insert:

On and after the 1st day of January, 1875, United States legal-tender notes in sums of $1,000 and its multiple shall, on demand by the holder thereof, be redeemed by the Treasurer of the United States, either with coin or with United States bonds at par as he shall elect. The principal of such bonds shall be payable in coin in ten years from the 1st day of January, in the year in which they may be issued, and shall bear interest payable semi-annually in coin at the rate of 5 per cent., and shall be free from State and municipal taxation.

That is only a part of the previous amendment. It leaves out entirely that which was objected to by the Senator from Missouri, and which appears to have been objected to by many other Senators. It provides for the redemption of legal-tender notes in United States bonds or in coin on demand by the holder, but it leaves entirely out the other side of the proposition which I had in my own mind, making bonds convertible into legal-tender notes. It is merely one side of the question.

Mr. MORTON. The effect of this amendment is to authorize the conversion of all the legal-tender notes into a 5 per cent ten-year bond. There is no provision for their being paid out in any way whatever. It only involves the conversion, and contraction to the extent of the conversion.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GORDON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion and let us get through with the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope we shall get through with the bill to-night.

Mr. SARGENT. I am willing to withdraw the motion for the purpose of voting on the pending amendment; but we certainly cannot sit here all night.

Mr. MORTON. Let us go on as far as we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California withdraw his motion?

Mr. SARGENT. I will for the purpose of this vote, if Senators wish to vote on the pending proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] to strike out all of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, after the first word, "That," and insert the matter read by the Clerk.

Mr. SCHURZ. Is that a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator from Connecticut is out of the Chamber at present, I will call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, and Stockton—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Conover, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hager, Kelly, Pratt, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Wadleigh, and Wright—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORTON. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORTON and Mr. ROBERTSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is announced, I desire to state that, for one, so far as I am concerned, I wish to see this matter closed to-morrow.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. This is all out of order. Announce the vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Windom—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, and West—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Kelly, Patterson Pratt, Ramsey, Stevenson, Stewart, Wadleigh, and Wright—19.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 31, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. E. PARSONS, of Howard University, Washington.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITION OF TAX-PAYERS OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of the tax-payers' convention of South Carolina, for such relief as Congress can grant from burdens arising from alleged frauds and misrule in that State; that it may be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

This petition, Mr. Speaker, is signed by gentlemen of such character as precludes the idea that it is frivolous or without any such foundation as would justify an investigation. Of course previous to an investigation no gentleman should assert the fact of the existence of such frauds or misrule. The prayer of the petition is that it may be referred to the Judiciary Committee for investigation; that it may be printed, and that the committee may have power to send for persons and papers in that investigation.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman what this Congress has to do with taxation in the State of South Carolina?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know if there is any remedy in Congress for what these petitioners pray to be relieved from. They pray in general that, if there be any relief within the constitutional power of Congress to grant, Congress should grant it.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the gentleman might perhaps be able to point to the authority in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I confess myself that I do not see exactly the way to secure the relief in that regard from taxation which they pray for. There may be, however, some relief within the power of Congress; and if the investigation of the committee should show there is, Congress may grant it.

Mr. RANDALL. I have only to say that I should be glad to see the people of South Carolina have relief in that respect. But I think the source of relief is within themselves, and solely within themselves; and for one I deprecate any such proceeding as this, which could be cited hereafter as a precedent. We have enough perhaps of this centralization, and are moving rapidly enough in that direction.

Mr. DAWES. If I may be allowed to add a word, I would say that I have been careful not to assert any foundation for this complaint. I have merely stated to the House that this comes in the name of gentlemen from that State of such character as would justify an investigation only. These gentlemen in respectful language petition Congress and present their complaints. I think it is the duty of Congress to hear them fairly, and to see whether there may be any remedy or not. And I would say, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the manner in which this is presented and this prayer is addressed to Congress is such that it can be made a precedent for no other case; because there is no assertion, in simply presenting this petition, of any power on the part of Congress; but that general relief is prayed for which this Congress may find in their power to grant.

I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that centralization is an evil to be guarded against, and that the rights of States should be protected as sedulously and as carefully as the gentleman from Pennsylvania could wish for. At the same time no citizen of the United States who presents his prayer to Congress in proper language should be turned away from the doors of Congress without a fair and candid and just hearing at its hands.

Mr. RANDALL. I am as fully and as largely in favor of the right of petition as any man can be; perhaps I should have agreed with Mr. Adams had I been here at that time. I certainly think that what he did was in the right direction and was well done; but while I would give to this petition, for it is in the nature of a petition, a proper reference for investigation, I want also at the same time to warn these petitioners that the most dangerous power that can be invoked from the Federal authority is that which they petition for, the interference of the Federal Government in the internal affairs of their State. I would like to know what would be thought at this time if Congress should undertake to act in reference to the taxation of my own State?

Mr. DAWES. That may be wise and proper enough as a caution, but it is altogether premature before the petitioners have been heard or the House can know officially from the proper authority what it is they desire.

Mr. RANDALL. What they desire is a matter of public notoriety, and therefore I had a right to speak of it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why is the petition presented in this manner and not under the rules, and referred in the usual way?

Mr. DAWES. For the reason that you cannot present a petition under the rules and have it printed, and have authority given to the committee to send for persons and papers. I call the previous question on my motion.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the committee deem it necessary that they have power to send for persons and papers they will say so. I object to granting them that power now if it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. The objection of the gentleman from Tennessee comes with an ill grace from him.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will waive the demand for the regular order for a moment. I was absent from the House on a committee when this petition was presented.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will say in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that I was engaged in the investigation of the Ku-Klux outrages, and know something about the condition of affairs in the Southern States. He says the objection comes with an ill grace from me. That is a matter of taste between him and myself.

Mr. DAWES. As the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WALLACE] desires to be heard, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WALLACE. I have been absent on a committee and know nothing at all about this matter.

Mr. WHITELEY. I ask that the indorsement on the petition be again read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has presented a petition, of which the Clerk will again read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The petition of the tax-payers' convention of South Carolina, for such relief as Congress can grant from burdens arising from alleged fraud and misrule in that State.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that the petition he referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed, and that, in regard to the prayer of the petitioners, the committee shall have a right to investigate it, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the latter part of that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the latter part of the motion requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. DAWES. Then I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the better course.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no objection to that.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. DAWES; and it was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was referred and ordered to be printed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. LOWNDES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with the report of surveys for the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, made under the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. STOWELL, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads were discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and the same were referred to the Committee on Claims:

The petition of C. H. Hale, assignee of Hale, Windsor, Crosby & Co., for compensation for extra services rendered in carrying the mails from the years 1866 to 1870 inclusive; and

The petition of Benjamin Best.

BIDS FOR MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. STOWELL, by unanimous consent, presented a communication from the Postmaster-General, in relation to bids for contracts for carrying the mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSIONERS TO VIENNA EXPOSITION.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2780) for the relief of the commissioners to the Vienna exposition; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported (as a substitute for House bill No. 2177) a bill (H. R. No. 2781) amendatory of and supplemental to the act entitled "An act to set apart a certain tract of land lying near the head-waters of the Yellowstone River as a public park," approved March 1, 1872; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

RELIEF OF NAVAL CONSTRUCTORS.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on War Claims in regard to House bill No. 217, for the relief of naval constructors of vessels of war; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

SWAMP LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BLAND, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the county court of Laclede County, Missouri, asking that the title to swamp lands situate in said State be confirmed; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 2342, for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, which was reported back by the Committee on Railways and Canals and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, be taken from the Committee of the Whole and made a special order for consideration in the House on Tuesday, April 21, 1874, at the hour of half-past one o'clock p. m., and that at four o'clock of the next day, the 22d, the previous question shall be operative.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to except the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. STONE. I will do that.

Mr. NEGLEY. And also except the bill for the protection of life and property on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. STONE. I am asking for but two days for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. And another suggestion: this bill comes from a committee which never before had this subject under consideration. It should have been referred to the Committee on Commerce; that is the proper committee to consider it, not the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. STONE. The bill was referred by this House to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and that committee has devoted the last four months to the consideration of this subject. It was reported back unanimously from the committee, and now we ask that a day be fixed for its consideration. As to the question whether it should have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, I do not undertake to say. It was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and that committee has considered it.

Mr. NEGLEY. The House must understand how difficult it is——

The SPEAKER. It is too late to discuss the question now as to what committee should have considered this subject. The reference of the matter was made four months ago.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to make an exception of reports from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the committee have determined upon a policy to be adopted in regard to the mouth of the Mississippi River, I will not object to this being made a special order. If they have not so determined, I must object.

Mr. NEGLEY. At the earnest request of the gentleman, agreeing as I do with him as to the importance of this work, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. LOWE. Does this proposition include the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does not. But the Chair would suggest that if the previous question is ordered at four o'clock on the second day, the bill will be very apt to go over to the third day.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to making the previous question operative on the first day at four o'clock.

The SPEAKER. With that modification is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri?

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

CEMETERY AT SALT LAKE CITY.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a substitute, Senate bill No. 347, granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes; which substitute was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider.

PONTON BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back House bill No. 2538, to legalize and establish a ponton railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and ask that it be put upon its passage now. The bill has been very carefully considered, and it contains all the provisions and restrictions hitherto agreed to by the House in connection with such bills.

Mr. POTTER. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill which they are authorized to report at any time.

Mr. KILLINGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose this is the regular order, as the committee were authorized to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. It would be the regular order, except for the fact that the previous question is operating on the Portland and Louisville Canal bill, which comes up for consideration.

Mr. CONGER. This is a very important bill; it is for the appointment of an agent to examine the fur-seal fisheries of Alaska.

Mr. KILLINGER. I insist upon the regular order.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House now resumes the consideration of Senate bill No. 350, providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, on which, the previous question having been ordered, the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WHEELER,] is entitled to one hour to close the debate.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, aside from the large and indefinite appropriation of money made by this bill it involves questions of as grave if not graver moment than any upon which this Congress has yet been called to act; among others, the delicate one of how far the national Government may exercise alleged rights in a sovereign State. The whole bill demands, and I trust will receive, the careful and deliberate consideration of the House.

At the commencement of the discussion I may be pardoned one word in relation to my personal attitude toward the measure. Some gentleman, unknown to me, has placed upon my desk an extract from some newspaper which purports to contain a telegram to the Inter-Ocean at Chicago, from some correspondent here, in which I am charged with duplicity in relation to this bill. Now, sir, I desire to say, once for all, that I am here to find no fault with the newspaper men. It is their right, as it is their duty, to search public men "as with a lighted candle;" and it is our fault if they take anything by the search. I accord to these men the full liberty to criticise my public acts and my public motives; and I shall never find any fault with them for so doing. If they do me a temporary injustice, time will surely right me. If they do me simple justice and I am in the wrong, then the fault is my own. In this matter, this correspondent, whoever he may be, is simply mistaken as to the fact. I call upon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who has championed this measure in the House to confirm the truth of what I say—that I have never opposed this appropriation of money; that I have been entirely content that this entire amount of a million and a quarter of ascertained indebtedness and an unknown amount of unascertained indebtedness, with $114,000 of taxes assessed by the city of Louisville, shall be paid to carry out the purposes of this bill. I have never objected, in committee or out of it, to the amount of money involved in the bill. I have placed my opposition from the outset simply upon the question of cession of jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] I wish to say that while I have not seen the article referred to, I understand the fact to be that the gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, has from the beginning raised no question upon this bill except to insist that, before any money shall be paid, the State of Kentucky should make a new and unequivocal surrender of jurisdiction over the canal. The gentleman from New York I think made that suggestion at the outset of the discussion before the Committee on Commerce, and I understand that to be his position now.

Mr. CONGER. As the same report charges me with opposition to the bill, I wish its special champion [Mr. HOLMAN] would say whether I have not always during the last two years favored the general course of action which this bill prescribes, making my objections solely on the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have always understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to favor the passage of this bill. I know that he has discussed the question of jurisdiction; but I was not aware up to this time that he has ever said or done anything in opposition to the measure.

Mr. CONGER. I speak of it because I am charged in the same article with hostility to the measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has always shown a disposition to act with entire fairness toward the commercial interests of the Ohio Valley, and I hope will still.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, Mr. Speaker, so much for this point. This article further charges that I have placed myself in hostility to the commerce of the Ohio Valley. In this connection, whatever shortcomings I may have as a public man, (and they are perhaps not few,) I think this House will give me credit for one thing, and that is for frankness. I never engage in any controversy in which I do not intend to carry my flag out, so that it may be seen by all men. I never intend in debate, or in other positions here, to occupy an equivocal position. I deny, sir, that I am opposed to the commerce of the Ohio Valley, or the commerce of my country anywhere. I am an American, sir, loving and desiring the interests of my whole country, and longing for the time when this anomaly of a boundless country overflowing with every element of wealth, but yet a giant with its financial muscles paralyzed, shall cease; when this giant with renewed strength shall put forth all its power, not only for the purpose of improving existing channels of commerce, but for multiplying new ones for the common benefit of the whole country. So much for my personal position.

The Louisville and Portland Canal Company was incorporated by the State of Kentucky in the year 1826, for the purpose of building a canal around the Falls of the Ohio River, a distance of two miles. The Government of the United States first became interested in it in the year 1826, when by an act of Congress it subscribed one thousand shares of the ten thousand shares which made up the capital stock of that company. In 1827 an additional act of Congress authorized the subscription of thirteen hundred and fifty more shares, making in all a money subscription of $235,000. Before the act of 1842, to which I shall presently allude, and under its operation, the United States had become the proprietor of five hundred and sixty-seven more shares. This made an aggregate of twenty-nine hundred and seventeen shares of the capital stock of this company. And, Mr. Speaker, I want to lay down here the proposition that that is every dollar of money that the United States ever paid into that capital fund. I will demonstrate that before I get through, and if I fail to do it, it will be from lack of capacity and not from lack of correctness in the statement. I say, then, that if this corporation were dissolved to-day by operation of law, for any purpose whatever, the United States would be simply entitled to take out of the assets the proportion of value which twenty-nine hundred and seventeen shares bear to the whole number of shares, and no more.

The fallacy of this bill rests in this, that the United States have become the proprietors of all the shares except five shares—a fact, Mr. Speaker, which has never been conceded by the Legislature of Kentucky, and a fact which has been persistently, and I say legally denied by the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me to make one inquiry of him?

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Indiana will remember that I did not interrupt him or any other gentleman during this entire discussion yesterday, and I prefer to go on without interruption.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is an inquiry pertinent to the gentleman's statement. When this whole case was before Justice Miller, did he not decide that the Government of the United States was the exclusive owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal?

Mr. WHEELER. Justice Miller decided no such thing. He decided only that the officers of the United States might go on to the Louisville and Portland Canal for the purpose of expending an appropriation which this Government made for the general improvement of that work as a part of the Ohio River—a similar appropriation to that made for the improvement of the numerous harbors of the country. Nothing more, nothing less, did Justice Miller decide. He said that the expenditure of that appropriation was not detrimental to the bondholders, whose rights had accrued subsequently to this transaction of which I am now speaking and subsequent to 1842 and 1844. He said they might go on and do anything which did not interfere with the security of those later creditors of this corporation. He did not undertake to decide this other question.

This, Mr. Speaker, is one-third, not quite one-third, of the capital stock of this corporation. The Louisville and Portland Canal Company have said to the United States, from the beginning down to this day, "You must content yourself with voting upon that stock. We will allow you under our Kentucky charter to come into our corporation meetings and participate in the election of directors. Nothing beyond that." They have limited the operations of the United States under the ownership of this stock to that one transaction; and that is the position of the canal company to-day.

This condition of things remained until 1842, when it became evident the commerce of the Ohio River demanded enlargement of the canal. Let me look at this legislation of 1842 in view of this interest which had thus sprung up for the improvement of this work. Let us see what its import is. I ask the House now to follow me carefully, because on this legislation of 1842 and the supplementary legislation of 1844 turns this whole question. I say it is so clear, that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err in its construction.

By an act of the Legislature of Kentucky, approved February 21, 1842, the board of president and directors of the canal company were authorized, whenever so directed by the stockholders thereof, to sell "the shares of stock owned by individuals in said canal to the United States, or the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls; or, further to effect this object, the board of president and directors, when so authorized as aforesaid," were clothed with "the privilege of appropriating the net income arising from said canal to the purchase of said stock instead of making dividends therewith."

The fourth section of this act provides—listen attentively—

That the shares so purchased by said board shall be held in trust by it for the purposes herein declared, and shall be voted on by them at all subsequent meetings and elections, until, by the operation of the provisions of this act, all the shares standing in the name of others than the Government of the United States shall have been purchased up; and when the said shares shall have all been purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements so as fully to answer the purpose of its establishment, and, further, to protect and guard the interests of commerce.

What is the import of this statute? Look at the necessity which had arisen for the enlargemennt of this work, and which I could prove by the contemporary history of the enterprise, had I the time, had become an imperative demand all through the West, expressed by public meetings and elsewhere—look at this proposition of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky in 1842, by which it said to the United States, to the State of Kentucky, and to the city of Louisville: "If either of you will take this canal and make it free of toll"—and that is not all, that is but a minor part of it—"if you will enlarge it and make it meet the present demands of commerce, you shall have it upon these conditions, and upon no other." This proffer to the United States, by which these tolls were to accrue and be applied to the purchase of the stock of others than the United States, and this promise to transfer this stock to the United States, were upon the simple, sole condition that the United States should accept this trust and enlarge this canal.

Mr. Speaker, the United States never made response to this proffer, except, as I will hereafter show, to repeatedly decline it. They never paid one dollar toward this purpose. They never did one solitary act toward its performance; not one.

The history of this canal shows that from 1842 to 1844 the United States occasionally interposed an objection that the cession of jurisdiction was not full enough. And in 1844 the Legislature of Kentucky passed another act, which, as the directors of this company say in their printed reports, of which I have a volume here, in their judgment met the objection, that the cession of jurisdiction was not complete, and saying that if the Government would take it, if the Government would enlarge it, then the Government was entitled to it under the State act of 1842; but asserting all the way through that the Government of the United States could not take this property except in pursuance of the trust created by the act of 1842, not only to reduce the tolls, but to enlarge the canal so as to meet the demands of commerce.

Here is this act of 1844. See how carefully it is guarded: "That in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal"—a thing it could only do by accepting this trust of improving the canal and making it as free as it could be, deducting only operating expenses; the United States could not take this stock purchased by surplus earnings, not a dollar of it, except by performing that trust in its entirety—it was only in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal under the trust created by the act of 1842, that the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth of Kentucky over said canal was to be yielded up to the Government of the United States.

Now, I ask the House to observe in this connection that it is upon this proposition that this bill proceeds. It is sought now to bind the State of Kentucky to the proposition that she made thirty-two years ago, and which I will prove by and by she has clearly withdrawn. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yesterday glanced a little at the point I now proceed to discuss. This act of 1844 went further than all this. It went so far as to provide that, even if the property were transferred to the United States, the Commonwealth of Kentucky reserved the right to regulate the tolls upon this canal forever. And this has never been repealed, as the gentleman from Iowa well said yesterday.

This act of 1844, after the propositions of 1842, amounted simply to this: "Take the canal, enlarge it, perform the trust, and we will excuse you from so much as compels you to make an annual report to the Commonwealth of Kentucky; holding in our hands, however, as a safeguard, if at any time you make the tolls too high, the power to reduce them." And this bill proposes to accept the canal with this condition. Is the Government of the United States, Mr. Speaker, to disburse this million and a quarter of known indebtedness and an indefinite amount of unknown indebtedness, and then to hold this property subject to the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, for all coming time, to regulate the tolls upon the commerce of the Ohio River? If so, it will be the first time the Government ever placed itself in a strait-jacket of this character.

I say, and if I am wrong in this legal proposition let some of Kentucky's eminent lawyers upon this floor contradict me—I say the State of Kentucky has never repealed this restriction of the act of 1842. It is in force to-day. And if the United States has to take this property under this bill, it has to take it subject to the right of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky to control the tolls upon it forever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the agent of the United States was present at the meeting of the stockholders of this company at which this proposition of 1842 was accepted. What did the United States declare by that act? "We are perfectly willing to forego dividends upon our stock and that the surplus earnings shall be used in absorbing the outstanding shares." The Government of the United States has never performed any other act looking toward the execution of this trust; it has never paid a dollar of money, nor has it ever done one other thing in the matter of the enlargement and improvement of the canal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the act of 1842, which said that the dividends of this company, its profits, should go to the purchase of the stock other than that owned by the United States, this stock in 1855 had all been absorbed, with the exception of the five shares which are now held, at the instance and by the special request of the Government of the United States, by the gentlemen who operate this canal. Let us see what was the attitude of the Government at this time, after this stock had all been purchased. The scrip itself is in the possession of the canal company, it has never been transferred to the United States; it has never been authorized to be transferred by the Legislature of Kentucky; and the position of this company to-day is that the United States can vote only on its original shares, with the small number which it acquired prior to 1842.

After 1842 and in the year 1855, when this stock through this process, under the operation of the act of 1842, had been acquired, as alleged by the friends of this measure, by the United States, these directors called upon the United States to take upon itself the fulfillment of the trust of 1842, and what was the answer? Here is the answer of the President of the United States:

Let the improvements be made with the tolls, with the distinct understanding that the Government commits itself to nothing involving a material change in the capacity of the canal and locks; incidental expenses to be strictly within income at reduced tolls, as proposed.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

APRIL 21, 1855.

The President said, further, that he would make a recommendation to Congress, and I will show you the subsequent action of Congress by and by. That was the attitude of the Government of the United States. In the absence of Congress the President of the United States declared, in effect, that the canal must enlarge itself, that the Government would not undertake the trusts of 1842; but said to the directors, "You must do it with your own means out of the revenues of the canal."

Now, I want to say once for all that this stock could only become the property of the United States by the acceptance of the trust created by the act of the Legislature of Kentucky, of 1842; a thing which it has never done. No one will pretend that the Government of the United States can take possession of this canal without the consent of the State of Kentucky. The bill itself goes upon that hypothesis and points to the act of 1844, carefully omitting all reference to the act of 1842. The act of 1844 was simply amendatory of the act of 1842, and every provision of the act of 1842 stands to-day, except that which was waived by the State of Kentucky in the act of 1844. This is a proposition made by the State of Kentucky thirty-two years ago. This doctrine of surrender which has been put forth upon this floor and in the bill, pointing only to the act of 1844, is proved very much as we prove our religious creeds. We select such passages from the Bible as sustain our views, and omit all the rest. Now, this bill proceeds upon the assumption that it was an absolute proffer on the part of Kentucky, without condition, to surrender this canal under the act of 1844. The material question in the whole matter is, did the United States ever accept the proposition of the act of 1842? If they did, the State of Kentucky is concluded; if they did not, she is not.

Let me now recall to the attention of the House once more the legislation of Kentucky of 1842, whereby the Legislature of Kentucky said, first, that Kentucky itself may do this if it sees proper, or the United States may do it, or the city of Louisville; but that if the United States took possession of the canal it must be upon the condition that she should enlarge and improve it. The United States have never undertaken that trust, and hence have never owned a dollar of the stock.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him where the title to this acquired stock rests, and who is authorized, as the law now stands, to represent that stock?

Mr. WHEELER. It rests to-day in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company. The officers of that company hold five shares absolutely in their own right, and they hold the rest under this trust.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to ask a further question. I wish to inquire whether the State of Kentucky could put a limitation upon the purchase of stock by any person who should desire to purchase, that they must pay their money for it, and then hold it in trust? Is not that a limitation which the State could not impose?

Mr. WHEELER. The State of Kentucky said by the act of 1844, supplementary to that of 1842, that she would give full jurisdiction of this property to the United States if the United States would enlarge and complete the canal and make it free of toll. She has made that proffer, and it is the only one she has ever made in that direction. The directors acquired these shares by the permission of the United States, not with the money of the United States, except so far as what its shares earned under the act of 1842; but they hold these shares acquired by the revenues of the canal, and they hold them subject to the act of 1842. They hold them under these anomalous conditions.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Did not the canal belong to the stockholders?

Mr. WHEELER. It did; but they parted with their rights so far as they sold their shares under the act of 1842.

Mr. ELDREDGE. One other question.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman must pardon me; he is taking up too much of my hour and drawing me away from my line of argument.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I only wish to understand this question; I was not criticising the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that fully; but the gentleman will see that these interruptions disturb my line of argument.

Now, the history of this whole enterprise shows that the Government of the United States repeatedly refused to do anything by way of improvement of this canal. Let us see how the company itself regarded this matter in 1858, three years after this stock had all been absorbed, and after, as alleged by the gentleman from Indiana, the United States became the owner of all but the five shares. I ask the Clerk to read some extracts I have marked in an answer made by the company in response to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury claiming the right to control the canal.

The Clerk read as follows:

The president and directors of the company cannot concede the correctness of what appears to be the basis-idea of your letter, to wit, that in the existing status of the relations of the United States to the company the Secretary of the Treasury possesses the controlling voice in the direction of the course and affairs of the company. It will certainly be the pleasure, as well as the admitted duty, of the president and directors so to direct the management of the affairs of the company as to preserve the interest of the United States in the property and in the avails from its use. The expenditures which have been made since the absorption of the shares of private stock, by virtue of the operations of the company under the act of the Kentucky Assembly dated 21st February, 1842, have all been made with the concurrent approval of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being; and your letter of the 26th of May last is the first notification received by the board of a change of disposition on the part of the United States as to the management of the affairs of the company for the future. The president and directors are but trustees of the stock acquired under the operation of the act of the 21st February, 1842, before referred to; but you will observe that, by reason of anything which has thus far transpired, the United States are not proprietors of any stock in the company beyond the shares held absolutely on the 21st day of February, 1842, and in the management of the affairs of the company are entitled legally to no further control than by the vote of said stock they can give to the company in the selection of its officers. The president and directors, as in duty bound, have advised the Government of the business of the company, and have awaited the pleasure of Congress to make the appropriations, or to assume the obligation to make such appropriations, as would carry out the objects of the trust declared by the act of the Kentucky Assembly dated February 21, 1842. The United States can only acquire the proprietorship of the property in the whole canal upon the basis established by said act; and, with all respect to Congress, it does seem to the undersigned that a reasonable period within which the election might have been made has already transpired. But as you observe in yours of the 26th of May last that it was your purpose to report to Congress all the facts in the case for its action, the undersigned is instructed to say that, until Congress shall have again had a full opportunity to act in the premises and to legislate upon the facts, and to elect whether the United States will undertake the trust declared by the statute of Kentucky, or will devolve its execution upon the other parties in interest, as stated in the statute, the president and directors will so conduct the affairs of the company as to observe with all fidelity the preservation of such surplus as shall represent the shares of the United States compared to the aggregate belonging to the whole stock of the company.

Mr. WHEELER. Now that ought to be satisfactory to this House as to this point. This company said in 1858, "We have repeatedly called upon the Government of the United States to accept and perform the trust under the act of 1842, and it has persistently refused." If I had time I could take the current history of the legislation of that period and show you how, time after time, bills were introduced into Congress for the purpose of carrying out the trust of 1842, but received no action. I say that Congress never did accept that trust; and only by its acceptance could it claim the right of ownership in the canal and the control of it. Down to this day the Louisville and Portland Canal Company recognizes the United States only as a voter to the extent of one-third of its stock, and in no other capacity.

Weary of delay in any plan for the enlargement of this canal, which was the main purpose of the legislation of Kentucky in 1842, in 1857 the State of Kentucky took the matter into its own hands. By an act approved December 19, 1857, it was declared that the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company should be so amended as to authorize the said company to construct, with the revenues and on the credit of the corporation, a branch canal sufficient to pass the largest class of steam-vessels navigating the Ohio River; and said company was vested with all the powers and authority to acquire and hold the necessary lands for such branch canal, and to construct the same, as were vested by the charter and amendments for the construction of the original canal; and all the provisions of the original charter and amendments were made as applicable to the branch as to the original canal. That is the legislation in 1857 of the State of Kentucky. Tired of the delay of the United States in undertaking an enlargement of this canal, the State of Kentucky thus set about doing it itself, or set the machinery in motion to do it; that is, authorizing the company to do it with its own revenues.

Now, let us see what was the action of the Government of the United States in relation to enlarging the canal upon the plan of this legislation of 1857. Pending this, let us see how the company regarded this matter in 1859. Here is the report of the company for the year 1859, in which occurs this statement:

During the past year important movements have taken place at various points in the West in reference to the enlargement of the Louisville and Portland Canal. Meetings of merchants, steamboat masters and owners, and others interested in the navigation of the Ohio River, have been held at Cincinnati, Madison, Louisville, and other places, and measures adopted to bring the subject before Congress; and the board entertain the hope that during the present session Congress will either authorize the Government to receive the work, or consent (as its ownership of 2,902 shares of the capital stock makes it desirable it should consent) that the board proceed to carry out the enlargement of the work as contemplated by the statute of Kentucky.

Here is the declaration of this company in 1859. Now, let us see what the Government of the United States did in pursuance of the act of the Kentucky Legislature of 1857. On the 24th of May, 1860, Congress passed the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company be, and they are hereby, authorized, with the revenues and credits of the company, to enlarge the said canal, and to construct a branch canal from a suitable point on the south side of the present canal to a point on the Ohio River, opposite Sand Island, sufficient to pass the largest class of steam-vessels navigating the Ohio River: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize said president or directors, directly or indirectly, to use or pledge the faith or credit of the United States for the said enlargement or construction, it being hereby expressly declared that the Government of the United States shall not be in any manner liable for said enlargement or construction: Provided further, That when said canal is enlarged, and its branch canal is constructed, and the cost of said improvement paid for, no more tolls shall be collected than an amount sufficient to keep the canal in repair and pay for all necessary superintendence and management.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York will observe in this connection that at that time, in 1860, Congress had suspended entirely the making of appropriations for public works. That resolution was passed in consequence of the adoption of that policy at that time on the part of the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. That act was passed simply to meet the requirements of the Kentucky statute of 1857. What was the attitude of the Government of the United States upon this matter in 1860? It said, virtually, "We will not pay one dollar toward the enlargement of this canal. You may go on and enlarge the work yourselves; but we will not be liable"—this is the substantial language of the substitute—"for one dollar; you must do the work wholly at your own expense and with the revenues of the canal." Such was the legislation of 1860. Is this consonant with the idea that the United States had become the owner of this property under the Kentucky acts of 1842 and 1844; that they were keeping the trust imposed by the legislation of 1842 to enlarge and improve this canal so that it should meet the demands of commerce? It is entirely at war with any such idea.

Under this legislation of 1860 sprang up a new class of rights. Let us see how the company regarded the matter after this act of 1860 was passed by Congress. Here is the declaration contained in their report for 1860:

By this joint resolution—

Referring to the joint resolution I have just had read—it will be seen Congress has in effect ceded the stock of the United States to the objects of the trust declared by the statute of 1842.

And so it had. The United States Government has now become a secondary proprietor in the Louisville and Portland Canal. Under this provision of 1857 the company went on; it issued bonds secured by mortgage upon the canal and its revenues for over $1,500,000. It did this with the knowledge and consent of the United States. This has all been done since the act of 1842 was passed by the State of Kentucky. What follows? The State of Kentucky has authorized a new trust to be created. Her laws and her honor are pledged for its strict fulfillment; and she is right when she comes in, as she does by the later legislation of 1872, and says that she will not surrender this property until this new trust created under her laws and by her sanction is fulfilled. It is for her to say whether she will permit the United States to step in and fulfill this trust for her, or whether she will carry it out herself.

I say that the aspect of this question was entirely changed by the legislation of the State of Kentucky in 1857 and by the legislation of Congress in 1860. The United States virtually said, "We will take our chances in this matter; our interest, whatever it may be, may be pledged with yours for the purpose of enlarging this canal. Go on; enlarge the work yourselves; do what you can with your own revenue; but understand that the national Government provides expressly that it will not be bound for one dollar of your liabilities." Strange and anomalous proceeding for the United States to take with a piece of its own property, which, according to the allegation of the gentleman from Indiana, they acquired in 1855.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make this declaration, of which I challenge contradiction. From that time down to this day the United States Government has never asserted by any solitary act the control of that property. Go to the archives of your Treasury Department, and you cannot find there, until within a year or two and since the project of this bill began to be agitated, a solitary communication that has passed between the Government of the United States and the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; not one. Strange and unprecedented treatment by the United States of its own property.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] falls into an error. The Committee on Commerce in their report embraced only one letter on the subject; but there has been an extended correspondence of the same character since 1855.

Mr. WHEELER. I know the correspondence. It relates to an appropriation for this canal, as we appropriate money for rivers and harbors generally. I am saying that as to this peculiar relation alleged to exist between the Government of the United States and this canal company the United States have made no sign. You cannot find any indication of it in the Treasury Department. The Government of the United States has not to-day a solitary badge of ownership in connection with this property. The Government can by her representatives attend the meetings of the company; she can vote upon her original subscription of stock for directors; she cannot do anything else. These directors manage the work under the laws of the State of Kentucky. The Government has no other right to-day, and can have none, except by permission of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. Speaker, under circumstances like these, this bill contains the startling proposition that the Secretary of War—an officer never before recognized in connection with this work; for the Secretary of the Treasury has always had control of it so far as it has been controlled up to 1860; has managed all the correspondence, not by permission of the State of Kentucky, not by permission of the corporation holding the property, not by permission of the courts—shall take possession of this property.

What, the Federal Government, through the War Department, enter into the domains of a sovereign State, and take possession of its corporate property! Is this the modern doctrine of State rights? Sir, it is at war with my ideas of the rights of the States, and I should be unworthy to represent the district of Silas Wright if I failed to utter my protest. The Federal Government by power of arms to enter a sovereign State without its consent, and take forcible possession of one of its corporations! It is a proposition which should not be entertained for a moment by any one who has any regard for the rights of the States.

Why the Secretary of War? Why not the Secretary of the Treasury? He has always had the management of this canal. Sir, I have a little regard for law yet, and though during the eventful years which have just passed we were compelled to do some things which looked like a violation of the law and the Constitution, the time has come when we should return to the old anchorage-ground.

Mr. Speaker, Kentucky says, by her own legislative action, she does not consider herself bound by this proposition of 1842. What means this proposition of 1872, if there be any force in the old law of Kentucky, which I say the United States has repeatedly declined from the day of this proffer down to this bill, the Government never having performed a single act under that trust, not one single act which has entitled it to the possession of this property. What did the Legislature of Kentucky do in 1872? I ask the Clerk to read this resolution of March 28, 1872.

Mr. MELLISH. I should like to ask my colleague a question. Is he in favor of the bill as amended?

Mr. WHEELER. I am in favor of the bill as amended. I meant to state that in the outset. I will go in this matter of internal improvement as far as he who goes farthest. I will do anything within the limits of the Constitution and the Treasury for the commerce of this country, but I want all to be done under the forms and sanctions of law, with no violation of the rights of States or individuals. With this amendment I am in favor of the bill and shall vote for it. My position is this: when the Government of the United States pays a million and a quarter of ascertained indebtedness and the floating debt of this canal, she ought to be the owner and ought to control it without the consent of the State of Kentucky or of the city of Louisville. She ought to own it as she owns the other public buildings throughout the United States. Look at the offer of Kentucky to surrender this property, made in 1872.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of Kentucky, That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company are hereby authorized and directed to surrender the said canal, and all the property connected therewith, to the Government of the United States, upon the following terms and conditions:

1. That the Government of the United States shall not levy tolls on said canal, except such as shall be necessary to keep the same in repair, pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements.

2. That the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper: Provided always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal, and so constructed as not to interfere with its navigation.

3. That the title and possession of the United States of said canal shall not interfere with the right of the State to serve criminal and civil processes, or with the State's general police power over the territory covered by the said canal and its appendages.

4. And further, that the city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal: Provided, That the connections between the drains and the canal shall be made upon the plan to keep out mud and garbage.

5. That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the actual owners of the property contiguous to said canal, its branches and dams, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Department of the United States Government which may have charge of the said canal.

6. That the Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

Mr. MELLISH. When were these resolutions passed?

Mr. WHEELER. In 1872. I shall not stop to look at these resolutions in detail. I wish the House to settle the question whether they want to pay their money for the purpose of purchasing this property upon these conditions:

The city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper.

There is no recognition of any governmental superintendence here. You cannot build a bridge across the Ohio or the Mississippi River unless it is put under superintendence of the Government. The city of Louisville is to be the judge of this.

Provided, always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal.

Who is to be the judge?

That the title and possession of the United States of said canal shall not interfere with the right of the State to serve criminal and civil processes—

That is right. It ought not to be a harbor for thieves and other criminals. Now let us look a little further:

or with the State's general police power over the territory covered by the said canal and its appendages.

The United States cannot use it for anything that would interfere with the general police power. The State of Kentucky has reserved to itself not only the right to serve criminal and civil processes, but to regulate the general police, which covers every detail of the management of the canal. Does the Government want it upon that condition and this large appropriation of money?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask if it is fair for the gentleman from New York to say that? Does not his committee oppose recognizing this joint resolution of 1872, and are they not unwilling that the Government should accept the control on the basis of that joint resolution?

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman did say he would not accept it on that. But that is the only proffer of this property made by the State of Kentucky.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill itself, as reported to the House, says that the Government takes the work under the act of 1844, and not under the act of 1872. The committee unanimously agreed, except the chairman, that we should not take it on the basis of the act of 1872.

Mr. WHEELER. I will not allude to the action of the committee further than to say that the gentleman is mistaken about that. I might state the action of the committee if I would. We were a unit in favor of my policy at one time. We are divided now. But I will not follow out that proposition of 1872, because the gentleman says the Government should not and cannot accept the work under it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say the Government cannot. But I say that before the passage of that joint resolution we had a sufficient surrender of jurisdiction over this work by Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER. I pursue the argument, then, without reference to the proposition of 1872. The State of Kentucky is perfectly right if she proposes to say that this new trust created in 1857, for which her honor and her law are pledged, shall be carried out by her. She has the right to control this canal until this debt is paid, as she stipulates she will do; and the debt does not mature, the last of it, till 1884. She has the right to control it, and she has taxed it repeatedly. Now, the advocates of the bill say that the State of Kentucky has not asserted, and that it is not probable she will assert, this right of taxation. Let us see what the fact is. From 1846 to 1853 the State of Kentucky taxed this property systematically, as I will show you. Let one instance suffice for all. In the report of the canal company for 1846 this remark occurs:

It will be noticed, by an item in this account, that the State of Kentucky has taxed the entire property and franchises of the canal; consequently no stockholder can be holden to give in the amount of his stock for taxation, and thus be subjected to a double tax.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman whether he laid this information before the committee?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not. I did not have it when the bill was in committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. What document is the gentleman reading from, and where did it come from?

Mr. WHEELER. It is a volume containing the reports of the company.

Mr. HOLMAN. Who furnished it?

Mr. WHEELER. I beg to say to the gentleman that I have the right to fortify myself in this debate with such facts and arguments as are within my reach. I am responsible to the House for the truth of my allegations. And I say that from 1846 to 1853 the State of Kentucky systematically taxed this canal, and the United States itself taxed it during the war. Look at the report for 1866, and you will find this assertion substantiated. Surely a strange proceeding, that the United States, having become owners of this property in 1855, as is claimed by the gentleman from Indiana, should tax it in 1866. When before did the Government of the United States ever tax its own property?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will explain how these directors came to furnish him with this information. They have not so favored his committee.

Mr. WHEELER. I will with pleasure. I wrote to the city of Louisville to obtain it. When I speak upon this floor I mean to speak understandingly and to know what I am talking about. I do not mean to grope in the dark and take things on assumption. And I claim that it is my right and my duty to inform myself when I address this House, and I claim the right to obtain information from whatever source obtainable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will extend the time of the gentleman from New York, and allow us a few minutes for an answer.

Mr. WHEELER. I will be satisfied if the House gives me as much time as has been taken from me by interruptions.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to address an inquiry to the Chair. Does not the currency bill come up at this hour, half-past one o'clock?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it is understood that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] has his time extended in order to complete his speech, and that we shall have a few minutes for an answer.

Mr. WHEELER. I asked repeatedly yesterday that the time of the gentleman from Indiana should be extended without limit or condition.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman proceeds, will the Chair state what is the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The order of business is this: the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] took the floor under the previous question at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock, and five minutes were lost by the confusion in the House. He has now spoken one hour, and the regular order is to vote on the bill and amendments, but the gentleman asks a short extension of his time to make up for interruptions.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that he be allowed ten minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Give him all the time he wants.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point I make is whether at this hour the special order, the currency bill, does not come up.

The SPEAKER. Not while the previous question is operating.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, I will not interpose any objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the extension of the gentleman's time.

Mr. WHEELER. All I desire is that the House shall have the facts before it. I have no personal interest in this matter, and shall most cheerfully acquiesce in the decision of the House whatever it may be; but I repeat that in the year 1866 the United States did what it never did before, if, as gentlemen claim, it owns this property. Here is a precedent for the United States taxing its own property. I have here the report of the canal company for the year 1866, in which I find this concluding remark:

The taxes paid in those two years (1865 and 1866) were also unusually heavy, amounting in the former year to $11,698, of which $7,676 went to the United States, and in the latter to $10,430, of which $6,430 went to the United States.

It seems that taxes to the amount of $8,022 were also imposed by others besides the United States after, as it is claimed, the State of Kentucky had surrendered its property to the United States, and the United States had accepted it and become the owner.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as we have never been able to get any part of this record, which the gentleman has read, before the Committee on Commerce, I trust he will have the whole document printed.

Mr. WHEELER. Sir, if the Representatives from the State of Kentucky sit here to-day and hear the names of Guthrie and Speed impugned in this way, I will vindicate them, and do it by warrant of an officer of the Government of the United States.

Mr. STANDEFORD. I asked the gentleman a few moments ago to allow me to make a brief explanation, and he would not.

Mr. WHEELER. I say that the Government of the United States in 1867 sent its own Treasury agent there, and that that gentleman came back bearing testimony to the honesty and fidelity of the gentlemen in charge of the canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. According to the gentleman's own account——

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman will please not interrupt me.

Mr. HOLMAN. You have plenty of time. Mr. Guthrie, as Secretary of the Treasury, showed that this canal was the property of the United States; his own reports show that fact.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call the gentleman from Indiana to order.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, in regard to this matter of taxation, I say this, and I challenge contradiction by the eminent lawyers on this floor from Kentucky, that under her laws the State is bound to assess this canal property for its State tax of forty-five cents on the dollar, and I say further that any tax-payer in the State may compel, by mandamus, the assessing officers to put this property upon their lists if they neglect or refuse to do it. Every tax-payer has a right to ask that his own tax shall be lightened by the burden which this canal company ought to carry. Sir, the suit brought by the city of Louisville against this company was opportunely withdrawn only last Wednesday. A suit for $114,000 of unpaid taxes due by this canal company was withdrawn last Wednesday. The common council of Louisville dismissed the suit. What right had the common council of Louisville to dismiss a suit in which every tax-payer in the city of Louisville was interested? And what guarantee have we that when the United States shall have put its neck into this noose the suit will not be renewed? Ah! they have good lawyers in Louisville. I do not know the city attorney in Louisville, but I know that he is a most adroit and capable lawyer. He knows what he is about, and the common council knew what they were about.

Mr. STANDEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Not now.

The common council of the city of Louisville are shrewd men. Here is their resolution:

Be it resolved by the general council of the city of Louisville, That the city attorney be, and he is hereby, directed to suspend action in the suit now pending against the Louisville and Portland Canal Company for taxes; and, in the event that said canal property should pass into the hands of the General Government, the city of Louisville hereby relinquishes all right, title, and interest whatever she may have in any claim for taxes against it.

I expect that the gentleman who drew that resolution had read the Kentucky resolutions of 1872, where they expressly affirm the right to control this property until all its debts are paid, to wit, until 1884. And I expect that during the entire interim the city of Louisville and the State of Kentucky will not only feel at liberty to assess this tax, but I hold that any tax-payer in Kentucky can compel the assessment by a mandamus, and there is not a lawyer on this floor who will contradict that proposition.

Here is the statute of Kentucky to which I would allude, in which is defined what property is taxable in the State of Kentucky; and this property is not excepted. It was said, to be sure, by some gentleman on the other side—I think the gentleman from the Louisville district, [Mr. STANDEFORD]—that in 1838 the State of Kentucky passed an act providing that the city of Louisville should except this property from assessment. That is unquestionably true.

And right here I will say that there seems to be something wrong; but whether the State of Kentucky is at fault, or those who purchase our law-books, I cannot tell. But the fact is that you can find but a few volumes of the statutes of Kentucky in our law library. And I am indebted to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] for this copy of the statutes of his State. I cannot find whether the provision of 1838 has been repealed or not. In order to obtain information upon that point I telegraphed to the former Attorney-General of the United States, Hon. James Speed, asking him if under the laws of Kentucky, independent of the ownership of the United States, this property was taxable by the State of Kentucky and the city of Louisville. Here is his response:

Independent of United States ownership the State and city can tax the Louisville and Portland Canal.

We are to take this property, if at all, under the proposition of 1872; and as to taxation, we are to hold it at the peril of any tax-payer of Kentucky until the year 1884.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not this bill expressly declare, as amended by your committee, that this property shall be exempt from taxation by Kentucky or Louisville?

Mr. WHEELER. Ah, it does; that is just what it does; and I am coming to that pretty soon. The fact that the taxation has not been uniform and systematic in this matter does not make against the right of the State to levy this tax. "Time does not run against the king" is an old maxim; and it does not run against the State. They are a very good people in Kentucky if, when the Government takes this work and pays for it, there is not one sharp tax-payer down there who will say that the Government shall pay taxes upon this canal property.

Now I come to the proposition incorporated in this bill—a provision that none of this money shall be paid for taxes. But where does that lead us? It leads us just here: these gentlemen in possession of this canal have refused to pay the tax. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] by his amendment says that the Government shall not pay it. What is the result? When this property comes to be assessed it will be sold under the statutes of Kentucky for non-payment of taxes, and the Government of the United States will lose all its right, or it must come in and pay the taxes.

Here is another invasion of the rights of Kentucky. Are you prepared for this, that the Government of the United States by its armed power shall enter your domain, take forcible possession of your property, and set your tax laws at defiance? If there be no gentleman from that gallant old Commonwealth to resent this insult to her sovereignty she shall have the benefit of my feeble protest.

Will anybody pretend that this canal can be taken independent of the offer of Kentucky in 1872? And does any one believe that these bonds are going to be presented for payment before due? The very moment the Government assumes the payment of them they will go to a premium of from 12 to 15 per cent. And are they verdant enough in Kentucky, even if they submit to this infraction of their State rights, to bring these bonds here, worth this premium, and present them to the Treasury for par payment, as this bill provides?

So much for the legal aspect of this case. I want to come now to the policy of this bill. This bill in terms is a permanent, indefinite appropriation. It appropriates $100,000 a year absolutely for the payment of the debts of this company, without limit and without qualification. That is a stretch of legislation in which this House has never indulged since I have been connected with it. I do not object to that; so great is my desire that this canal shall be made as free as it may be independent of actual running expenses, that I am perfectly willing to vote for it. But when the precedent is established, I give notice to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that I shall come forward with a proposition, and call upon him to vote for it, for the national Government to take the Erie Canal and all the canals of the State of New York and pay their debts and make them free, providing only for the expense of their operation and maintenance.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is the property of the Government of the United States. We do not now propose to make an appropriation to build a canal or to buy one. The proposition is, whether we shall take possession of our own property, or leave it in the hands of five irresponsible parties who are interested in keeping it within their own control.

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman certainly——

Mr. WHEELER. I do not yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

[Mr. HOLMAN made some remark which was not audible because of the Speaker's rapping with his gavel.]

Mr. WHEELER. I had supposed that this was my speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. This bill violates a standing law and a standing policy of this Government. And if it is good policy for the United States at large, it is good policy for the State of Kentucky. I ask the Clerk to read a statute of the United States which I send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution making it the duty of the Attorney-General to examine into the titles of the lands or sites for the purpose of erecting thereon armories and other public works and buildings, and for other purposes.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to examine into the titles of all the lands or sites which have been purchased by the United States for the purpose of erecting thereon armories, arsenals, forts, fortifications, navy-yards, custom-houses, light-houses, or other public buildings of any kind whatever, and report his opinion as to the validity of the title in each case to the President of the United States.

2. Resolved, That it shall be the duty of all the officers of the United States having any of the title papers to the property aforesaid in their possession to furnish them forthwith to the Attorney-General, to aid him in the investigation aforesaid.

3. Resolved, That no public money shall be expended upon any site or land hereafter to be purchased by the United States for the purposes aforesaid, until the written opinion of the Attorney-General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title, and also the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the land or site may be, shall be given to said purchaser. * * * *

Approved September 11, 1841.

Mr. WHEELER. Is that good policy for the country at large? If it is good for the country at large it is good for Kentucky. The Government never buys property except in the manner required by that statute, the question of the validity of the title being referred to the Attorney-General. We are not in the habit of buying property the title of which is clouded by a law-suit. In this case a suit is pending on the part of certain heirs for the recovery of this entire property. I do not undertake to pass upon the question of the title. The gentleman who appeared before our committee made a very plausible and specious argument. Let us see what the Secretary of the Treasury thought of this matter. He refused to carry out the appropriation of last Congress for reasons which he thus assigns:

While this subject was under consideration a communication was received from the president of the company, under date of July 9, 1873, informing the Department that "the Louisville and Portland Canal Company has been sued in the Louisville chancery court by the devisees of Colonel John Campbell, for nearly all the land owned by the company."

That suit is pending to-day in the court of chancery of the State of Kentucky. On account of this suit, the Secretary of the Treasury would not carry out the provisions of your legislation of last winter, but referred the question to Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury says further:

This suit which is now pending, and is understood to involve the title to all or nearly all the land through which the canal runs, has so changed the aspect of affairs that I deemed it the part of prudence, within the discretion intrusted to my judgment, to expend no money toward paying the debts of the company until these facts should be laid before Congress for its consideration and action thereon.

Now, sir, with a suit pending in equity for this whole property—a suit suspended, (I use the words of the common council of Louisville,) for $114,000 of taxes—shall we take this property with all its burdens? I ask simply that we take it as we take all other property.

We have been told in eloquent terms of the magnitude of the commerce of the Ohio River. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] who discussed this subject yesterday, spoke in most glowing language of $350,000 of annual tolls paid on this canal. The gentleman's oratory got the better of his arithmetic. There is no truth whatever in that statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York has got no report on that subject, unless he got it from the canal company or some person acting under their eye.

Mr. WHEELER. I have a report from the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, obtained by him by telegraph from the officer in charge of the enlargement of this work, Captain Adams, of the United States Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. General Weitzel, I believe, has charge of the work.

Mr. WHEELER. I went to General Humphreys, in charge of the Engineer Bureau, and followed his direction. He obtained this information for me; and I am not so suspicious as to believe that even the canal directors would not give an honest statement of the operations of that canal for the last navigation year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did the gentleman lay that information before his committee that they might act on it?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not. I did not make this speech before the committee. I reserved to myself in committee the right to offer this amendment in the House and to advocate it. I have performed what I supposed to be my duty, according to my convictions of right; and I am perfectly willing to leave the result to the House. I propose to attach to this bill a simple condition which we put on in the case of every petty purchase by the United States of a site for a court-house or a post-office; nothing more, nothing less.

One word as to this matter of tolls. The tolls of this canal last year were less than $200,000. For the commerce of the Ohio River I would do as much as for the commerce of any other section. The Government of the United States has since 1869 appropriated about one million and a quarter dollars to be expended upon this work. We are asked now to expend a million and a quarter more, making, with the floating debt, probably a million and a half dollars—nearly one fourth of all you appropriated last year to the entire commerce of the United States, and one-fourth of all we shall be able to give this year. In addition to that, we pay the interest on the bonds until 1884. Is it any more than simple justice that when we pay this amount, when we shall have assumed all these risks, the State of Kentucky shall give us such a title as we expect to get for all other property that we purchase elsewhere?

It is said that the Legislature of Kentucky meets biennially, and will not be in session again for two years. That is true. But that Legislature was in session this winter while this proposition was pending here, and might have taken action to make this cession of jurisdiction. But, Mr. Speaker, if the commerce of the Ohio River be so vitally important to Kentucky, let her convene a special session of her Legislature. One day's sitting and a bill of six lines will do the work. Then we shall have this property free from entanglement; we shall take it as we take all other purchases; and with that I shall be content.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment——

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is a motion pending to reconsider the vote ordering the previous question.

Mr. CLYMER. I yesterday entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to hear an amendment which I desire to submit as an amendment to his amendment, if the House should decide to reconsider the previous question.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no quarrel at all with the gentleman from Indiana in this matter; he knows well my desire in the case. I cannot be content with anything that stops short of what I have been advocating. There is nobody that can transfer this property to the United States except the State of Kentucky.

Mr. HOLMAN. All I ask is, that the power of these five men to control the work shall be extinguished by the Government, and that the work shall be placed under the control of the Engineer Corps; that no payment shall be made until this object is carried into effect. I want those five shares of stock extinguished, so that those five gentlemen who now hold them shall not control the revenues of the canal; but the Government shall see that the revenues are applied to the purposes to which they ought to be applied.

Mr. CLYMER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer as a substitute for the bill of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent to offer a further substitute, because as many amendments are pending as under the rules can be considered and voted on by the House. The Chair will, however, point out to the gentleman how the gentleman's purpose may be effected. Should the House reconsider the vote by which the main question has been ordered on the bill and amendments, it may then order the previous question on each amendment separately until the gentleman's substitute would be in order.

Mr. CLYMER. I merely desire my amendment to be read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves a reconsideration for the purpose of offering an amendment, which will be read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WHEELER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is offered will it be debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be debatable if the House were to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. CLYMER. I wish to offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.] I ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That if the State of Kentucky shall not cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right of said State to tax or in any way to assess said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof, at or during the time of the first session of the Legislature of the said State held after the passage of this act, that then the United States shall levy and collect tolls on said canal at the rate of the existing tariff of tolls on said canal until the United States shall be reimbursed and repaid in full for all moneys paid and expended by virtue of this act and until such cession is made.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky the Chair on further reflection doubts whether this amendment would be debatable under the peculiar circumstances of the case.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I must object to it, and I am sorry to do it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, and for this reason: This subject comes over from Monday, where it was placed under a suspension of the rules, and if the previous question had not been seconded last night the bill would not have come over as the unfinished business to-day.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the vote by which the main question was ordered be reconsidered, will it not then go over to Monday next?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not so hold, but that it would bring the House to an immediate vote on ordering the main question again on the bill, including this amendment.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask whether, in the event of the previous question being reconsidered, the friends of my amendment can be heard?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Would not the effect be to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and then leave it open to debate?

The SPEAKER. If left open to debate then this bill could hold the floor for the whole week. If the House should agree to reconsider, and divest itself of the previous question, the bill strictly would not then be before the House. It only holds now against the special order at half-past one by virtue of the previous question operating upon it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But the House could again determine to enforce the previous question, and thereby cut off debate after an hour's debate or debate for any given time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be compelled to give the floor immediately to the special order. It now only holds beyond the hour of half-past one, when the special order comes up, by virtue of the main question having been ordered last evening.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The bill would then go over to Monday next.

Mr. HOLMAN. May it not be a condition agreed to by unanimous consent that the reconsideration shall take place only for the purpose of allowing an amendment to be offered?

The SPEAKER. In that view the Chair would be willing to entertain the amendment if the House agreed by unanimous consent the vote should be taken immediately on seconding the demand for the previous question. The Chair hears no objection to that.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the Chair hold, if the House should reconsider this vote and the amendment should be offered, that amendment would necessarily be undebatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. How can the amendment be undebatable when the House never passed any order requiring the question to be at once taken without debate directly or indirectly?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken as to the fact. The House simply gave Monday for this subject. If the House had adjourned without ordering the main question last night this bill would not have been before the House to-day. It is now here by virtue of the previous question; and strictly speaking, if the rules were construed according to line and plummet, the moment the House reconsidered the vote whereby the main question was ordered and divested itself of the operation of the previous question then this bill would not be before the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does the Chair rule that the motion to reconsider is not in order on such a question as this?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not hold that; because the House might want to throw it over till Monday next for further debate. The Chair cannot rule on motives of members in that way.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] knows the affection I bear him; and I certainly would have admitted his amendment if I had had an opportunity of saying a few words upon it. But not having that opportunity, I must object to it.

The question being taken on Mr. CLYMER's motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, there were—ayes 68, noes 84.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHEELER and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 76.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House having agreed to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, the question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.] The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

Provided further, That said Secretary shall pay no money under any of the provisions of this act, nor shall the Secretary of War take possession of said canal as authorized by the next section, until the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax, or in any way to assess, said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That if the State of Kentucky shall not cede to the United States jurisdiction over said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right of said State to tax or in any way assess said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall remain owner thereof, at or during the time of the first session of the Legislature of said State held after the passage of this act, that then the United States shall levy and collect tolls on said canal at the rate of the existing tariff of tolls on said canal until the United States shall be reimbursed and repaid in full for all moneys paid and expended by virtue of this act and until such cession is made.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask my colleague to add a proviso that the toll shall not exceed ten cents per ton.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] one thing.

Mr. CLYMER. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say that this is a wilder proposition than any involved in the bill. The bill permanently appropriates $100,000 to be paid for the next two years until the Legislature of Kentucky convenes, and then, if the State of Kentucky neglects or refuses to cede jurisdiction, the Government is to reimburse itself by increasing the canal tolls—a right which it cannot exercise, as it is simply a tenant in the canal by sufferance of the Kentucky Legislature, and has no authority to fix tolls on the canal.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the currency bill is not now the special order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that if the rule were strictly enforced the currency bill would come up as the special order; but that not being insisted upon, the Chair announced that as conducing to the progress of the business of the House this measure would be brought to a vote without debate.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 124, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Bundy, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, John B. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. HOLMAN. To that I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman hear my amendment read?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the Chair, why, if it was in order to move a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, it is not also in order to move to amend that amendment?

The SPEAKER. Why, the simple reason is that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was offered before the previous question was operating and the gentleman from Indiana is trying to move one after the previous question is operating.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Chair will permit me, the previous question was called only on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the way the motion was made, distinctly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so submit it to the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had no other object than to get a vote on his amendment, and he got all he wished in having that vote. The Chair submitted the question as for the previous question upon all the amendments.

Mr. WHEELER. If there is any misunderstanding about the matter, I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no misunderstanding.

Mr. WHEELER. I think there is none myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will admit a single amendment it will be satisfactory to us.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will observe that the Chair stretched the ruling as far as it would bear without cracking in favor of the side that he represents. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York will allow this amendment to be read.

Mr. WHEELER. I must decline.

The question was put on Mr. WHEELER'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 87, noes 74.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 95, not voting 65; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HOLMAN said: My colleague, Mr. NIBLACK, has been called away from the House by business; if he were here he would vote "no" on this proposition.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the following amendment offered by Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, to come in at the end of the third section of the substitute:

But no expenditure or contract for expenditure of money shall be made under the authority of this section in any one year, to an amount greater than the amount received during such year from tolls on said canal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the substitute for the Senate bill, reported by the Committee on Commerce, as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the previous question is exhausted on the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not exhausted. The question rests on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce in the nature of a substitute for the Senate bill. The votes thus far have been on perfecting that substitute.

The substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill, as amended, to a third reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to interpose a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must recognize the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who has charge of the bill. If the House negatives the motion he may submit, the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was put upon ordering the bill to a third reading; and on a division there were—ayes 117, noes 35.

So the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House now resumes the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] a member of the committee, is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to say, before the gentleman proceeds, that besides the several gentlemen on the Committee on Banking and Currency who desire to address the House, quite a number on both sides have expressed a wish to speak upon this bill for perhaps twenty minutes each; that is the time several gentlemen have indicated that they would like to be heard. I propose that after the members of the committee have addressed the House, the further debate upon this bill be continued under a twenty-minute rule.

Mr. ORTH. I hope the gentleman will not press that proposition.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. COBURN and others objected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask unanimous consent that after one hour of debate further debate be limited to twenty minutes for each speaker.

Mr. ORTH. I object to that.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no disposition to press this proposition upon the House against the desire of gentlemen. I submitted it to the consideration of the House; if it does not meet the approval of members, I have discharged my duty and done all that I desire to do.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will ask unanimous consent that, after the members of the committee have been heard, the debate be then limited to twenty minutes each.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that. Why should the members of the committee have any more rights than the other members of the House?

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the proposition is not agreed to. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] will proceed.

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Speaker, the revenues, the finances, and the policy of our Government, are so intimately connected and depend so much one on the other, either for good or bad results, that a discussion of either seems almost of necessity to embrace the others; therefore I trust that I may be pardoned if in the time allowed me I speak somewhat of the question of taxation and of the policy which I think ought to be pursued, in connection with that other and absorbing question, the finances of the country.

I have sat here in my seat and voted for abstract propositions, containing some things which I approved, many things which I did not approve, and perhaps inconsistent with what I may say, because, under a suspension of the rules, I was forced to go on the record one way or the other, without an opportunity for explanation. I now say to this House and to the country that I do not consider myself bound either politically or otherwise to the support of these propositions unless, after due consideration, they shall meet the approval of my judgment.

It occurs to me, that, at the present juncture in our affairs, it is a waste of both time and words to talk about decreasing taxation; whatever may be the desire of particular localities, and the views of particular gentlemen on this floor, in regard to this question, all must candidly admit, that the wants of the Government in the present exigency are such, that from motives of patriotism alone, if for no other reason, no step should be taken to lessen taxation during the present session of Congress. Contenting myself, therefore, with a simple statement of what I deem to be a necessity, I shall allow that statement to go forth with my vote against a repeal of any of the taxes set forth in the bills reported to this House by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

It is not altogether because of the late financial scare that I am thus constrained to cast my vote, for I believe if proper action had been taken in the early days of the session there would not be much left of that scare, but because I consider, that even in any but the most favorable times, the revenues of the Government are quite too low to enable it to meet promptly its obligations, be at all times master of the situation, and able to respond to the just demands of the country in the way of appropriations. In my judgment, the 10 per cent. reduction of the last Congress on import duties was not warranted by the occasion. Instead of making such reduction, had the republican party, while yielding to the wishes of the people of the country, and granting comparatively large appropriations for public buildings, for rivers and harbors, and for other worthy purposes, insisted that such action forbade a reduction of the revenue, I believe we should not now be required to listen to so much of talk that savors more of the scare than it does of sound, sober judgment; and perhaps we might have been saved a lecture on our sins, wickedness, and short-comings generally.

In some of the battles of our late war we often noticed from the reports that a few were killed, a few more were wounded, and that a great many were very badly scared. Now, sir, that illustration gives a very good idea of the effect of the late flurry in the money markets; a few bold operators or reckless speculators were killed, some were wounded, more or less severely, while the great mass of the grand army of men who make up and represent the activity, industry, and wealth of this nation, were only badly scared, and the result has shown that our currency, which has heretofore, by many, been deemed sufficient to carry on the legitimate business of the country, was largely hoarded by all classes of people. To illustrate how foolishly this was done in some instances, one man buried his greenbacks in the ground, not even taking the precaution to select a dry place, and the rain descended, as it always does, on the just and on the unjust, and the buried greenbacks were destroyed by the ruthless mildew that succeeds moisture.

I cannot subscribe to the opinion often expressed, that there is great financial distress throughout the country from which will result widespread ruin, but rather that this monetary disturbance and unusual condition of financial affairs results from the fact that the business of the country is now out of joint, and that as soon as definite action is taken by Congress and its financial policy fully understood, business will get into proper shape again much faster than one listening to the debates here would suppose. That the uncertainty, and doubt in the public mind, as to what action Congress will take, touching financial matters, is to-day paralyzing our business interests to a far greater extent than the financial flurry which occurred last September, is to my mind the statement of a proposition so clear and certain that words are but wasted in any attempt to elucidate it.

Nor do I believe in nostrums in the way of legislation, labeled "Bills to prevent financial panics," any more than I believe in bills to establish perpetual motion, to change human nature, or to eradicate original sin.

I regard the cause, the occurrence, and the cure, as beyond the scope of the wisest legislation; and so long as there exists among any considerable portion of the human family an inordinate greed for gain, a desire to amass wealth by some bold dash, or uncertain speculation, trusting the result to the fickle goddess, Fortune, instead of having it come from the sweat and maxims of plodding business; so long as there are men who live in the world one generation too soon, so long will there be flurries, scares, and panics in the money markets, and no legislation can be devised to prevent them.

In considering our national monetary system we must not lose sight of the fact that, as a matter of necessity, in the preservation of its integrity, and the suppression of the rebellion, in order to supply the sinews of war, the Government was compelled to assume control of that system; and as this control still rests with Congress, the people are now looking to it, expecting, that, in view of the late disturbance, some definite action will be taken by it in relation to financial matters, but uncertain what that action will be. Owing to this fact—and no man can regret it more than I do—the money of the country, instead of being thoroughly distributed in obedience to the laws of trade throughout its ordinary channels, has accumulated largely in the vaults of its great moneyed institutions, and there is in operation a most rigid system of contraction, which is withdrawing from circulation the great body of the currency and placing it beyond the reach of the real business interest of the country.

Gentlemen tell us that money was never so plenty as now, and never so cheap as at the present time; that the rate of interest was never lower than now; they assume to say that he who asks for an improvement in the financial situation, who asks that money may be restored to its normal business and commercial channels, is an inflationist.

For whom is there plenty of money, by whom can it be obtained cheaply?

It is a sorry day for the fortunes of any people when money is begging to be hired on call, with Government bonds as collateral, at 3 per cent., earnestly pleading for a piece of gilt-edged paper at sixty days, at 5½ or 6 per cent., yet turns a cold shoulder to the business community at any price. It means that confidence in the legitimate business of the country is gone. It means that industry must cease, that laborers must be idle and starve, that faith is gone, and hope almost obscured.

This, sir, is our condition to-day, not so much because of the panic, but because timid capital is at a loss to know what this Congress will do with the finances. Money will continue to accumulate in the vaults of our great moneyed institutions and continue to grow cheaper to those who do not care to borrow until something is done to restore that confidence which is wanting by reason of delay in congressional action. When such action is taken, let it be what it may, then the people will adapt themselves to the situation; then will money begin to flow in its accustomed channels; then will industry be again revived, and labor again in demand.

Gentlemen may talk of economy here until doomsday, and the longer they talk the more timid capital will grow, and, every time a speech is made on the late financial panic and the distress of the country caused thereby, the money-lender will give his money-bags a tighter grip, and the rate of interest on call with good collaterals, or on gilt-edged paper, continually fall.

Gentlemen tell us that money is cheap, yet do they know, and can they tell, who will loan it to the manufacturer, or business man anywhere, except on call, or gilt-edged paper?

I have long since learned to look for breakers ahead when these kind of cheap loans monopolize the money market. It is a very certain indication of general distrust and want of confidence, and he who does not heed such warning and put his house in order, is pretty sure to find that house tumbling down about his head. The wealth of the people is not enhanced by these kinds of loans. They are a sort of luxury that can be indulged in only by the capitalists. Wealth is always evolved from the struggles, the labor, the hardships, and sometimes the failures, of men, and the process must be a slow one, indeed, if not altogether stopped, unless capital will consent to take risks, and not always demand gilt-edged paper, or Government bonds as collateral.

The business interests of the country demand that Congress should promptly take some action in relation to the question of finance, whether such action be of the wisest character or not. Almost any conceivable action, that may be accepted as decisive and as indicating the policy of the Government in this respect, will be better than to further prolong this delay and uncertainty; for we are to-day practically without circulation, not so much because of the late panic, so called, but rather because of the timidity of capital. Our money is hoarded, and will be until it is known what this Congress will do; therefore the question of taxation, of appropriations, and all others, sink into insignificance when compared with that of our monetary system. Let us set the wheels of industry in motion first, and then see what we can afford to do about these other matters. What shall we do? Shall we make an earnest and business-like effort to perfect our present system, or shall we try some new experiment which may launch us on an unknown sea, and thus force us to provide against perils "which we know not of?"

The theorist may indulge in new views and new systems, of finance, philosophy, economy, or even of theology, until the ripe old age of four-score is reached, yet the practical world will jog on, guided by the light of experience and observation, without even feeling the presence or influence of disturbing elements. It is only when we attempt to let go of what we are certain, and try something new, that the jar comes, which may prove a disaster.

Our present paper-money system is based on the theory of an ultimate redemption in coin. Out of the great war came the necessity, which forced the Government to issue its legal-tenders, as a substitute for that coin, with which the paper circulation, issued under our national banking act, is redeemed; and, while I cannot cut myself loose from the proposition that our whole system of finance is to ultimately rest on a specie basis, yet I am not willing that the men, who met the brunt of the rebellion, shall in their business suffer the shock of an immediate return to that basis.

Both of these issues are now in circulation, and both are limited; and, by this act of limitation, the Congress of the United States has attempted to say expressly just how much money the people of this country, pushing new enterprises, diversifying industry, and developing in a thousand ways and channels the resources of a magnificent continent, actually need and can have.

Far be it from me to distrust either the patriotism or the wisdom of the Congress of the United States; yet, I must be permitted to assert, that it has not the ability to determine just how much money circulation the people need, and the attempt to do it has been the cause of much of the financial disquietude which has prevailed throughout the country. To crowd the business of an active and growing people into an inflexible, cast-iron money system, is, to my mind, as absurd as it would be to force the matured man of forty-five into his ten year old breeches. It is undertaking an impossibility.

As I have already said, we have the two kinds of currency—the legal-tender, a substitute for coin, and the national-bank note, redeemable in that legal-tender or coin—and the real conflict to-day is between these two kinds of paper money. All side issues aid in this strife, and even he who argues that our present system of national banking is so far perfect that there is no need of its being either improved or expanded, or that we should now attempt to force upon the country specie payments, is doing more to aid the legal-tender side of the conflict than is the most ardent and outspoken supporter of the scheme.

If we are to have only so much paper money, and both are so nearly equal in value, how long will it be before that, issued directly by the Government, will assert its supremacy, to the exclusion entire of the other, and new issues thereof will, from time to time, be put into circulation to meet the demands of the people—every succeeding stress demanding and obtaining new issues—until all hope of ever reaching a specie basis must be forever abandoned. The people say, and justly too, that our present national banking system is a monopoly, and those of us who believe in the system as in the main wisely devised and best suited to our wants, must rid it of this hateful feature, or else it must go to the wall. There is no middle ground on which to stand here, but a bold issue is to be met.

Without discussing at length the various arguments pro and con, either in favor of or against either system, I will simply state that, with what light I now have on this subject, I can only support that system of a paper currency which is redeemable in legal-tenders, (now, if you please,) but ultimately in coin and legal-tenders, when they shall have appreciated to a par with coin, and which shall be so arranged that redemption shall not only be practicable but imperative. Redemption should not only be imperative, but the reserves should be held in the vaults of each banking institution, and always at command.

In other words, I would throw all proper safeguards around our present banking system, by amending the several acts under which it exists, and then I would make it popular, by making it free. I would legalize, as we have already done, the issue of the $44,000,000 reserve, so called, or, in other words, declare the legal-tender limit to be $400,000,000.

I would have no more of the game of fast and loose at the Treasury end of our money system, nor of an elastic currency, which allows one poor human will and judgment to hold and control the elastic end. I would rather that the people, who are alone responsible, if let alone, for the management of the business interests of the country, should determine this whole matter of how much circulation they require, either to move the cotton or other crops, than that one man should assume to do this, be he never so wise.

We owed this $44,000,000 to the people as an equivalent for the damage done to their interest by reason of our inaction on this question, and because they are justly entitled to a fair send-off in the spring trade, and thank God we have at last discharged the debt.

Mr. Speaker, if I saw in the bill under consideration the dangers to the business interests of the country which my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin, has with so much ability and credit both to himself and his constituents pointed out, I should not, as I do now with few exceptions, give it my hearty support. But I must be permitted to remind the gentleman that, in my judgment, he begs the question when, in pointing out the danger of inflation under this bill, he compares the national-bank issues to the French assignats or to any unsecured issue of paper money.

If the bill proposed to allow the people of the country to mortgage, at their own valuation, their wild and unimproved lands, and to use these mortgages as a basis for the free issue of paper money, dollar for dollar, then indeed would there be great force in his argument; but the gentleman will pardon me for suggesting that, in the present case, the basis of the two issues is just the difference between wild lands at an imaginary price and gold coin of the standard value.

I assume that the Government is both able and willing, and that it intends in good faith, to pay both the principal and interest of its bonded debt.

I assume that our gold bonds available for banking purposes are worth at least par, thus giving him the percentage in the argument, and that every corporation which may organize under the proposed law can only obtain ninety dollars of circulation for $100 in gold, the purchase-price of the bond which is made a perpetual pledge under the law for the payment of the ninety dollars of circulation thus obtained; and then I wonder how there can be a depreciation!

The assignats became depreciated, worthless; but does the gentleman claim that the national-bank notes to be issued under the proposed law can by any possibility become so?

I do not hesitate to say for the gentleman, and that, too, without fear of being corrected by him, that were we at a specie basis he would consider a system of free banking, such as is now proposed, a most desirable one for the prosperity of the country; and I give him credit for so much sagacity that I do not for a moment doubt that he is perfectly aware of the fact—a fact often lost sight of, I fear, in the discussion of this question—that our national banking system is, so far as circulation is concerned, on a gold basis to-day, and will be so under the proposed law; and that there is no more probability of the present or increased circulation becoming depreciated than there is of the Government becoming a bankrupt, and that the bill or note holder is and will be as absolutely secured as he would be were we at a specie basis.

I listened with great attention to his speech. It contains the whole argument on that side of the question, and is the best one I ever listened to; but I will venture to assure the gentleman that neither he nor his children, nor his children's children, will ever see the time under the proposed law, if it should be adopted and kept so long in force, when either he or they will be obliged to give a wheelbarrowful of national-bank notes, secured by gold bonds 10 per cent. in excess of their value in gold, for a bushel of wheat.

There is, Mr. Speaker, no danger, under the proposed free-banking system, of wheat going up to that measure of value unless the promise of "seed-time and harvest" is revoked.

For one, I believe in the stability and perpetuity of my Government, and rely on the promises.

I therefore protest against confounding our present and well-secured national-bank issues with the wild-cat issues which got loose under straw bail in other days, simply because the exigency resulting from the rebellion has been, and is such, that their redemption, for the purposes of trade and exchanges is for the present made with the legal-tender notes; and I submit in all candor that the whole argument on the question of a depreciated currency, if applicable at all, is solely applicable to the legal-tender issues; and that the national-bank issues, instead of embarrassing the Government in its attempt to redeem the legal-tenders in coin, aids it to do this by supplying the place of retired legal-tender notes, by taking up at home its bonds, and by retaining the coin interest at home and for home use.

The only argument which can be fairly urged against the measure is that it will stimulate trade, quicken industry, cure the dry-rot which has during the last six months eaten into the very heart of the business of the country; and that then we shall imperceptibly drift into the whirlpool of another panic, which will bring with it distress and result in financial ruin.

I admit that every active and commercial nation is just as liable to be taken with a panic as children are to be taken with the measles, and yet I believe, although we have got well past the middle of the nineteenth century, that there has not yet been discovered any sure preventive for either. I do not believe that my sagacious friend is at all afraid of being injured by a panic; nor that he feels competent to devise legislation which will be certain to prevent the occurrence of one. Sam Johnson, when he wanted to enhance the value of Widow Thrales's brewery, then being sold at auction, spurred thereto by his love for the fair widow, said to the bidders at that sale, "We are not here to sell a parcel of boilers and vats, but the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice." If Johnson could say this about a lot of unpoetic beer-vats and boilers, and a dusty old brewery, with how much greater force and power might the owner of a patent to prevent financial panics use the same language while trying to dispose of the right for some commercial center like New York. If New York had held such a patent last September, we should never have come so near losing, as we did then, the chance to legislate the $44,000,000 into circulation.

I must also take issue with the gentleman from Wisconsin on the fact as to whether our currency is excessive in quantity, and I now wish to call attention to that part of his speech where he shows by a careful prepared table the amount per capita in 1850, 1860, and 1870. He says:

The following table will show at a glance the population, wealth, and circulation in the United States in 1850, 1860, and 1870, and will completely set at rest any doubt as to whether our currency is excessive in quantity or not:

Year.	Population.	Assessed wealth.	Circulation.	Per head.
1850	23, 764, 706	$7, 135, 780, 228	$150, 000, 000 notes. 100, 000, 000 coin.	$10 50
1860	31, 127, 000	12, 084, 560, 000	200, 000, 000 notes. 150, 000, 000 coin.	11 30
1870	38, 115, 641	14, 178, 986, 732	700, 000, 000 notes.	18 42

From the circulation of 1870, exclusively irredeemable paper, I make no deduction for so-called bank reserves, because those reserves, held against deposits, form a necessary part of the circulation of the nation, and are doing, in the coffers of the banks, duty as such equally with currency in the pocket of the citizen.

From this it appears that circulation has been increased out of all due proportion to both our population and wealth.

I ask the attention of the House to that part of his statement relating to the year 1860 as having a tendency to mislead gentlemen on this subject.

He gives the population of 1860 at 31,127,000, the assessed wealth at $12,084,560,000, and the total of circulation at $350,000,000, including coin and notes; while in fact the amount of notes in circulation at that time, as appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was $207,102,477, and the amount of coin in the country at that time, as appears from the report of the Director of the Mint, was, at a low estimate, $275,000,000. This makes a grand total of $482,102,477.

In this 31,127,000 population in 1860 are included 4,000,000 slaves, who were mere chattels and not holders of money, but who in 1870 were citizens and held our money largely. Therefore the figures for 1860 should stand as follows: Population holding money, 27,127,000; assessed wealth, $12,084,560,000; circulation, $482,102,477; circulation per capita $17.44 instead of $11.30, as given in the table before referred to.

Besides it must be remembered that the calculation for the year 1870, from which he makes it appear that we had $18:42 per capita, does not make any allowance for the large amount of lost and destroyed notes, which if allowed would in my judgment reduce the amount per capita to very near the amount held in 1860.

I therefore submit whether from this revised statement "it appears that our circulation has been increased over all due proportion to both our population and our wealth."

Mr. Speaker, I was in great tribulation about the fate of this bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] who intends, as I am credibly informed, to make a speech on finance before the close of the present session, has told the House that it was "a bill of abominations."

When he made that assertion I was sorely troubled about its fate, and not a little bothered about the question as to whether or not the Committee on Banking and Commerce would go into history with its reputation questioned by the very highest contemporary authority. But imagine my surprise and delight when, on consulting the RECORD, I found this assertion to be, not the result of the distinguished gentleman's own well-matured reflections, but only a repetition of what some one had told him.

For myself, I care nothing; but I cannot help congratulating the eminent gentlemen with whom I am associated on that committee, on their narrow escape, and contenting myself with the reflection that it is yet at least an open question whether you, Mr. Speaker, in naming that committee have exercised that sound sense and judgment for which you have hitherto been so eminent.

Let us hope that when the gentleman from New York makes his speech he will set this matter entirely at rest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I claim the people have the right to increase the quantity of the paper circulation, yet I deem it fully as important that we, as legislators, are bound to see to it that its quality be not depreciated, but rather increased in value. If a paper currency is redeemable in anything, its value, of course, for the purposes of trade and exchange, depends on the value of the thing with which that redemption is made; and, inasmuch as our redemption of the national-bank notes must for some time be made with the legal-tender notes of the Government, it logically follows that, if such redemptions are made imperative, whenever there is a redundancy, anything, which enhances the value of the legal-tender, must also enhance the value of the national-bank note.

How then can this be accomplished? Most clearly any provision of law, which practically retires any portion of the legal-tender notes, must enhance the value of the outstanding portion thereof.

The committee's bill, now under consideration, provides, in section 3, that all associations organized under its provisions shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money—i. e., legal-tenders for the present—5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption thereof, as provided in the bill; but I think this section ought to be so amended as to provide for such redemption at any sub-treasury of the United States, instead of being limited, as it is in the bill, to the assistant treasurer in New York or the Treasurer in Washington. And section 5 provides, that every such association shall keep its lawful money reserves within its own vaults.

Therefore the effect of the provisions of the sections, above referred to, practically retires the amount of legal-tenders which go to make up the 5 per cent. for redemption purposes and the lawful reserves, to which must be added the average amount at all times in the hands of the people, and not available for banking purposes.

It occurs to me that, in this way alone, the value of the legal-tenders will be sufficiently enhanced to cause them to be sought after, and preferred by the people; and, as soon as that point is reached, the quality of our currency has commenced to improve. But, in order that there may be no mistake about this, and while I cannot, for obvious reasons, support the last section of the committee's bill, which provides for the hoarding of coin by the Treasury, yet I am in favor of, and as soon as the business of the country once gets into shape again, a gradual retirement of the legal-tenders, in some just ratio to the increased volume of national-bank notes, until they shall have been reduced by at least $100,000,000.

By this method the value of the legal-tenders would gradually appreciate, and eventually become equal to that of gold. Two causes would tend to produce this result: first, the decrease of the volume of the legal-tenders; and, secondly, the increasing demand for them for the purpose of redeeming the increased issue of national-bank notes. If this is inflation, then I am an inflationist; for it will give us a monetary system well adapted to the condition of the country and the substantial business wants of the people. It gives the people all the circulation they choose to take and pay for, and it gives them no more than they can pay for.

It neither increases the debt of the Government nor of individuals. It enables the people to supply themselves with an amply secured currency, always increasing in value, whenever and wherever most needed, by removing monopolizing restrictions, without removing those required by prudence and safety; and in the not distant future it will enable the Government to fund its legal-tender notes and retire from the banking business, a consummation that the experience of the last five months demonstrates is to be most devoutly wished for.

But, sir, the East, ever mindful of the wants of the great South and West, and ever anxious to provide for them in their own wise and beneficent way, tell us of those benighted regions that we do not want more circulation; that we do not need more banking facilities; that we are not yet far enough advanced to own and control these institutions; and that when we want accommodations we should apply to them. All the reply I have to make to this kind of talk is that we know we are poor; our rough-and-tumble struggle with nature enables us to be told of it without losing our temper. We trust we are honest, and we hope to be some day blessed with a more bountiful supply of this world's goods than we now control, and yet we think we are now able to avail ourselves to some extent of a system of free banking, if we can only be permitted to do so.

I know something of this people, of their resources, their industry and rapidly increasing wealth; and while I do not now claim that they have the ready money with which to buy as much circulation as the East is able to take up, yet they are both willing and ready to organize and start national banks with a limited capital, in nearly every well-settled county. You, of the East, know well enough that your banking capital, available for business purposes, is not represented by your circulation, but rather by your deposits, and we, of the newer sections of the country, have begun to appreciate the fact, and to know the importance of a national bank to every business community; not so much because of the circulation which it affords, although that is valuable, as because of the fact that it forms a nucleus about which will gather almost the entire idle money of a community, and make it available for business uses, so that the business man, with his neighbor's indorsement, can make a piece of paper desirable in the locality, but which you men of the eastern cities would not be willing to do at any price.

The national bank would have this effect always, because that class of people who hold the bulk of the idle money in any of our communities, have confidence in the system, and will keep it on deposit. We know well enough that the money of the West and South is hoarded by the laboring classes, that it is idle and cannot be made available for business uses; and we ought to know that each national bank with a capital of $50,000 will, if well managed, draw to it a very large amount of this kind of deposits, and that then the planter, the farmer, and the man of small means, instead of being crippled for the want of money, and obliged to sell his crop, or his property, could get accommodations which would enable him to avoid a sacrifice.

You of the East can never supply our home demand. Then why not let us supply ourselves?

Mr. Speaker, the district, which I have the honor to represent on this floor, contains an area of about twenty-five thousand square miles. Besides yielding largely in all kinds of agricultural products and fruits common to the State, its fisheries yield annually over $1,000,000, it produces annually one-half of the entire lumber, shingles, laths, and staves, manufactured in that State, and of the value, according to the last census, of $15,973,198, and the value of its iron and copper produced for the year 1873 amounts, in round numbers, to $15,000,000, these three items alone aggregating $31,973,198; and yet in that vast district, equal in extent to an empire, with all the elements of great and lasting wealth, and with a hardy population constantly increasing and actively engaged in many and varied channels of industry, there are only $366,840 of national-bank circulation, or a fraction over three dollars per capita. Prior to the passage of the national-bank act we had no bank in my own town, and if its business men wanted to borrow money they were obliged to run about and pick it up in small amounts, and on all sorts of contracts, thereby advising everybody of the stress in which they were, but mostly obliged to continually want it. Our money was nearly all in the hands of our laboring men and idle. Well, my people established a national bank with a capital which gave us $144,000 of circulation, and the result was that, on the 1st day of last September, our bank had a deposit account of nearly $500,000 available for business purposes.

We want more circulation to-day. Three institutions are now ready to take it, and are urging me to devise some way by which it can be obtained.

I thought, when the chairman of the Committee on Finance, at the other end of the Capitol, brought in his bill for a redistribution of the national-bank circulation, that the auspicious time was coming, and that I should soon be able to comply with the demands of my constituents; but to my surprise and consternation the people from the State of Rhode Island, who have only the small sum of sixty dollars per capita, confronted the honorable Senator from Ohio with a protest against such action, in which it was claimed that the business men of Rhode Island could not spare any portion of their immense circulation without injury to their interests, and, lo, my hopes vanished. Is it not just possible, Mr. Speaker, that these business people of Rhode Island, always so noted for their success and prosperity, are right in this matter, and that gentlemen, who are constantly trying, by every device which their ingenuity can invent, to so bend, and shape this cast-iron system that it will fit the business of the country, are wrong? Is it not just possible that there are defects in our present financial system, and that they can be remedied by wise action here, in such a way, that it may be open to all, and, at the same time be hedged about with such sure and certain safeguards, that an increase in the quantity of our paper money will not be incompatible with an enhancement of its value? Are not activity, industry, real growth, true development, and solid wealth the basis of our whole financial system, and is not a return to specie payments possible on that basis?

There never was a greater truism enunciated than that uttered by the veteran Senator of Michigan when he said on the floor of the Senate, "What we want is, more money and better money;" but I appeal to the sense of the country whether this want cannot be safely and securely supplied without forcing the country to undergo the shock of a forced resumption of specie payments.

Sir, it requires something more heroic than an act of Congress to place the country on a real and permanent specie basis. The problem can only be solved by eliminating the annual coin interest of about $100,000,000, which we pay on our bonded debt. Between the present paper-money era and a specie-basis era looms up, and always confronts us, this $100,000,000 of annual coin interest, which no act of Congress can per se honestly wipe out, but which must be decreased before we can reach that new era.

It cannot be reached by resolving to resume, but it can be through toil and labor, and taxation honestly applied to the reduction of our bonded debt.

Then, give the people prosperity and the Government revenues and we shall reach a specie basis which will be permanent and lasting without an act of Congress.

This is the business statement of the whole question, and the rapidity with which we shall move thitherward is only a matter of policy and expediency.

Entertaining as I do these views, I am not at all surprised at the position taken by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House when they say they are unwilling to vote either for increased taxation or for adding one dollar to the public debt, and that the expenditures must be cut down to meet the revenues, no matter what may happen. But I am fearful that this side of the House will too long yield to this demand, content itself with a do-nothing policy—spending its energies in attempting to cover unexpended balances into the Treasury—and in the pursuit of such a course, under the guise of economy will not only entirely satisfy the opposition, but convince the people of the country, by constantly paring down the appropriations, all the while forgetting that the revenues will decrease and decrease until bankruptcy must ensue, that the nation is still laboring under the throes of a financial panic so severe, terrible, and devastating as to entirely overcome its recuperative energies. I am, perhaps, not wise in statesmanship, but I do know that it is not for the interest of any party in power, and responsible for the conduct of the Government, to do just that thing which the opposition desires should be done, but that it should rather adopt some true and wise line of policy and follow it out, in spite of what the opposition may say or do. A party without a policy is an anomaly.

Do we understand what economy is as applied to the affairs of a great nation like ours? Are we not apt to theorize a little and talk foolishly about this matter, forgetting the true business principles underlying the whole question? Is it economy to say or do anything which has the least tendency to increase that loss of confidence occasioned by the late financial panic? to destroy that only thing now needed to quicken the energies of the people; to increase that only thing left of the panic? Is it economy to proclaim here in these Halls simply because the business interests of our country are, more through our neglect and inaction than by reason of the late panic, for a moment checked, and consequently the revenues below the immediate demands of the Government, that everything must come to a deadlock, and that appropriations must be cut down below the real wants and demands of the moment? Is it true that gentlemen on this floor are still talking and acting under impressions received before they left their homes to attend this Congress, and that the world and its business have not moved since then? Let me ask gentlemen to reflect before they subscribe to such a view. Let me beseech them to consider this proposition, in the light of experience, and of their business education, before they give it their unqualified assent.

I hold it to be an axiom that, in times like these, a true governmental policy of economy demands that everything in reason be done that can be done to restore, and strengthen confidence in business and in all legitimate undertakings, that we should make all legitimate appropriations for the wants of the Government, really necessary to be made, even though it costs more money to carry on the work than the revenues now seem to promise. It is, sir, no time now to cut down appropriations. It is no time to suspend work on either the public buildings or harbors where the work has already been commenced and carried forward to such an extent that, either loss will arise from its suspension, or commerce will suffer thereby. It is the proper time, however, to see to it that all such appropriations are carefully and prudently expended, that no extravagance or waste eats up the people's money and prevents it from doing the work set apart for it to do. But gentlemen will ask, "Where is the money to come from with which to meet these appropriations?" I answer, it will come from the increased revenues of the country, and that, if in the judgment of Congress, this increase seems to be insufficient, then I would increase the revenues, either by direct taxation or by import, duties. I tell you, the people are not opposed to taxation for the legitimate wants of the Government. They are only opposed to extravagance and waste in expenditures, to subsidizing monopolies and the despoiling of the public domain, by extravagant gifts and grants thereof, and to having their industries crippled by the delay and uncertainty of congressional action.

I would not borrow a dollar to meet a single ordinary demand of the Government, and I do not believe that, under the present circumstances, any party can survive, that either does it, or attempts to do it. The gentleman from New York, who had charge of the Army bill, told the country that western enterprise must be contracted; that the hardy pioneers must return to the more densely settled communities, and that the Government, in view of the late panic—of which nothing is now left but a little want of confidence—is unable to take care of them, unless they will huddle themselves together, and, like lost sheep, return to his fold.

Let it be recorded, sir, that here, in the Halls of the Forty-third Congress, that motto, which has for almost a century filled every young heart in this broad land with ambition and enterprise, "Westward the course of empire takes its way," is but a mere piece of buncombe, only intended for the Fourth of July; and that this great American Government, owing to a little flurry in the money market, which caused the downfall of a few bold operators, but which checked only temporarily the real business interests of the country, is no longer financially able to protect its own citizens within its own domain. That proposition is to my mind as humiliating as would be one to sell off to some foreign power that portion of our public domain not now really required for actual occupation and settlement.

I fear, sir, that we are overestimating the late panic, both as to its effect on the people, the business of the country, and the Government, believing it to be the near cause of certain results not at all attributable to it; and when I hear the other side roll well-turned sentences upon it "like a sweet morsel under their tongues," and see their faces gladden with delight when distinguished gentlemen on this side of the House let themselves loose on this fruitful theme, I cannot help asking myself, "Whose hands are pulling the chestnuts out of the fire and for whose benefit are they being pulled out?"

If the present session of Congress can only be frittered away in this kind of work, and if we can only be convinced that this kind of economy, which now seems to be the rage—an economy which is opposed to the investment of a single dollar, under any circumstances, in any of the permanent improvements of the country—is the best policy to be pursued, I for one fear that the people will consider us derelict in duty in not securing them the relief, and wise reforms now needed, and that "the place which now knows us will soon know us no more forever." I tell gentlemen that when they say from this high place that, either this Government, or this people are bankrupt, and unable to meet all appropriations necessary and proper to be made, they are sadly mistaken.

I am, sir, in the eyes of my confiding constituents, the peer of any man on this floor; and therefore at their behest, but with fear and trembling, I here assert and maintain that distinguished gentlemen holding leading positions on this floor are doing not only them, but the whole people, great harm and injury every time they say or do things, which tend to check that growth of confidence, which only needs now to be a little strengthened to cause business to be again revived and wealth accumulated all over this land.

I have said that I would not borrow one single dollar to meet or defray the current demands of the Treasury, but that I would, if necessary, impose additional taxes on the people to meet these demands, trusting their intelligence and patriotism to meet the emergency, in the same way in which they now meet every business engagement. There is no danger about the people's misunderstanding a business proposition, but there is danger of their becoming disgusted with a masterly inactivity—a frittering away of money and time on little things, while great interests, vital to their progress and welfare, are neglected and ignored.

Mr. Speaker, crowding itself on our attention, and jostling for precedence with this all-important subject of finances, comes another question for consideration. The cry has gone forth from every farm-house, shop, and cabin all over this broad land for cheaper transportation. The loud voice of the people has been heard on this subject, and it gives no uncertain sound. The appeal is made to us to take such wise action as shall in some certain sense answer this earnest demand of the people; not so much by legislation unfriendly to the great highways of traffic afforded by our railroad system, but by opening up and improving the great water-lines of communication between the North and South, the East and West, connecting the Mississippi with the East by canals, improving the navigation of that stream to its mouth, making the great lakes as one for all purposes of commerce, by improving the Saint Clair Flats, the Saint Mary's River and Canal, and doing everything, really needed in the way of improvement of harbors and rivers, that will tend to secure safety in transit, cheapen the rates of freight, and bring the producer and consumer nearer together.

For these great undertakings I am in favor of pledging the faith and credit of this Government even now, and in what some gentlemen may call dark days. These are the great natural arteries of this continent, and the people demand that they shall be improved and connected together by canals. Sir, I have but few, if any, grangers in my district; but it requires neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet to see what will be the results of this demand of the people. It must be wisely and well met, not only because it is demanded, but because it is right, and has in it the germs of development and wealth so mighty, powerful, and great, that they can hardly be foretold.

We must now either meet these issues wisely and bravely, or else we must give way and let our places be filled by others, who will catch the inspiration of the times, and be equal to the emergency.

Far be it from me to either find fault with public men or to indulge in doubt and uncertainty as to the future.

The signs of the times have for me no gloomy aspect.

The grand old party, which snatched a dying Government from the hands of its enemies, saved it, and made it progressive, powerful, and great, is yet true to its mission. Through it, as in time past, will come all needed reforms; and around it, when the supreme hour arrives, will rally the hosts of freemen.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my constituents need more banking facilities and more money, and my convictions are they ought to have both.

First, let me say, I regard the obligation of the Government to redeem the greenback as binding, and I will vote for no measure to either depreciate the value of the greenback or impair the Government credit.

Congress, in 1869, after the hue and cry of the western democrats for repudiation had somewhat subsided, passed an act to strengthen the public credit. This act binds the Government to redeem the greenbacks at the earliest moment practicable.

At present specie redemption is not practicable. It is not even possible. The people, who own the greenbacks, and who are the sole judges of the question of practicability, do not demand it now. The greenback is more popular than ever before, and it holds its value unimpaired amid all the clamors of all its detractors.

Upon all questions affecting the value of money legislation should be conservative. All legislation which disturbs existing values is immoral.

Resumption means contraction, with an inevitable depression of all values. This, at a time of general depression, would be scarcely less than criminal. It would bankrupt one-half the business men of the West and work outrageous injustice to the entire debtor class of the country. I represent that debtor class. Any legislation in the line of contraction appreciates the value of the dollars we have agreed to pay and decreases our chances of earning them. Scarce money and high interest will ruin us. We want cheap interest and easy credits. This stimulates industry, improves the opportunities of those who labor, and hardens our business muscle.

I represent a people whose wealth is to be realized, not by loaning acquired capital, but by developing our resources; a large agricultural constituency that has not yet reached its maximum development, and a commercial city (Toledo) of wonderful activity. We have all the elements of wealth. We want low taxes and cheap credits.

The Government can carry our obligations for 5 and 6 per cent. We cannot assume our share of these obligations less than 10 and 12 per cent. Our policy, therefore, is to let the Government carry our obligations until we become stronger, and give us the benefit of this 4 and 5 per cent. profit. We have tried to pay our debt too rapidly. The people of all sections need rest.

LIMITED FREE BANKING RECOMMENDED.

In providing for increased circulation to accommodate the West and South, I am willing to vote for a clause in this bill fixing a maximum for national-bank circulation, and also to limit said increase to sections lacking their quota of circulation.

The Representatives of the West, I am confident, would consent to make some Eastern State—New York, for instance—the standard for national-bank circulation. If free banking is limited to sections having less than the New York standard, eastern capital seeking profitable investment will be largely drawn to the West and South and invested in banks. I am therefore under conviction that such a measure would afford as prompt and satisfactory relief to the West and South as unlimited free banking. The East, being abundantly supplied with banks, capital, and currency, fears an era of unwholesome speculation from unlimited free banking. For one, I am willing to concede something to this conviction, and will, if opportunity is offered, vote to place such restriction in the bill now under consideration. But with those Representatives who advocate contraction and specie payments as a solution of our ills I take direct issue.

THE INJUSTICE OF CONTRACTION ILLUSTRATED.

Let me illustrate the injustice of contraction.

In May, 1869, I borrow of a money-lender in Hartford, Connecticut, one thousand greenback dollars, payable in five years, at 10 per cent. interest. This so-called $1,000 was worth the day it was borrowed $689 in gold. Specie payments are resumed, and in May, 1874, when my note is due, the value of the dollars I borrowed have increased 45 per cent., and beside paying my 10 per cent. interest in gold or its equivalent, I am also compelled to pay this Connecticut money-lender $311, in gold, for which I have received no value whatever. Do I pay this money justly, or am I cheated by a trick in legislation? Or say that a greenback dollar is worth 90 cents in gold today, and I borrow one thousand of these dollars, receiving nine hundred gold dollars in value, payable in one year, at 10 per cent. In the mean time specie payments are resumed, and next April, when my note is due, I am compelled to pay $1,100 in gold value for the use of nine hundred one year. I am thus swindled out of one hundred, principal, and $10 interest. That is, I have paid $200 for the use of $900 one year, or over 22 per cent.

These cases illustrate the injustice the contractionists would perpetrate upon the entire debtor class of the country There is no system of business morals or political economy that can successfully defend such a policy. It will not answer now to argue in justification that the credit class was robbed by the legal-tender act when the law was passed. That was a law of necessity, and only defended as a war measure. There is no code of ethics by which the borrower of a gold dollar discharges his moral obligations by paying in a greenback worth 50 cents. The credit class was robbed in 1832, 1863, 1864, and 1865, through the necessities of war, but what can be the pretense to rob the debtor class in 1874, 1875, and 1876?

Nearly every city, town, and corporation in Ohio have contracted debts and negotiated bonds upon a depreciated currency. To elevate the standard of value now is to largely increase these obligations.

Measured by its effects, elevating a depreciated currency is more immoral than depreciating it, because the loss in the first instance falls upon those able to bear it, while in the latter case it strikes down the struggling classes, and by paralyzing trade and manufacture, causes suffering to the laboring poor. The rights of both classes, debtor and credit, are sacred; and Congress has no moral right to increase the obligations of one or impair the obligations of the other.

FREE BANKING INDORSED.

A national free-banking law, with proper guards and checks, cannot depreciate the value of the greenbacks. The Government debt is not increased, nor are additional obligations incurred, by the issue of currency based upon Government bonds already sold.

Again, the money circulation of this country should be divorced as far as possible from the control of a political majority in Congress.

The question of the value of a dollar should not be debated on the stump and decided anew with every ballot. The bill-holder being secured and the value of a doller fixed, the money supply should be regulated by the immutable laws of trade. Agriculture, commerce, and manufacture should each be the sole judges of its moneyed necessities.

THE GREENBACK THEORY DISCUSSED.

Many practical and experienced financiers are of opinion that the Government should avail itself of the profits of circulation, and that the popular greenback should supplant the national-bank note, making one uniform currency. This is a fascinating theory. It is proposed to take up the three hundred and fifty-four million national-bank notes, issue an equal amount of legal-tenders, and with these notes go into the market and buy Government bonds. This, it is claimed, will reduce the interest on our public debt eighteen millions per year. This apparent saving, however, is somewhat delusive.

The present tax on the circulation of the national banks of 1 per cent. and $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. on deposits, and $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. on capital stock not invested in Government bonds, realizes the Government about $7,000,000 yearly, and State taxation, not far from ten millions more, or an aggregate of nearly if not quite seventeen millions. If there are inequalities in the present system, let us regulate that by legislation. But I am thoroughly fortified in the conviction that it is better economy to allow the bankers of the country to do the banking for the people than to establish a monopoly of banking at the national capital. I believe sections now demanding more currency can be better accommodated locally by banks than by a central system; and the amount of currency needed can be better determined and more safely regulated by the demands of business than by a political majority in Congress.

OUR MONETARY SYSTEM DISCUSSED.

Much is read and said here by those who desire a contraction of the currency about our gross violation of the laws of political economy. Let us examine this matter with due deference.

The Government of the United States has undertaken the critical duty of supplying the moneyed necessities of the people. It has, by imposing excessive taxes upon State banks, driven them out of existence, and to-day the money supply of this country is a monopoly.

For the past five years we have been increasing and extending the business of the country with marvelous rapidity; at the same time we have been withdrawing our money supply. This precipitated a panic, with immense loss of property and general paralyzation of trade.

Now, what is the remedy? I believe it lies in supplying the element, the lack of which produced the panic. Others argue that a continuance of the cause which produced the panic will work its cure.

Here we join issue. Bleeding is not prescribed by physicians for debility in the patient caused by the loss of blood. The money circulation of a country is like the blood circulation of the individual. In order to promote a wholesome life and a healthful activity, it must not only be sufficient in quality and quantity, but it must permeate and penetrate the remotest extremities of being.

THE FUNCTIONS OF MONEY.

What is this vital element called money, and what are its functions? Money is but a generalized agent for the exchange of values. Its potential requisites are: first, absolute solvency; second, universal recognition of its value. Our present currency is solvent. It has the complete confidence of the entire business world; but it is not equitably diffused, nor is it sufficient in volume to perform all its functions.

INEQUALITIES OF OUR SYSTEM.

Look at our condition in the West. Ohio is not the worst sufferer, and yet the lack of currency there is most seriously felt. We have credit, capital, magnificent agricultural resources, immense mineral deposits of coal and iron, central location, with markets in every direction, yet we have not adequate banking facilities. Our State banks are taxed out of existence. The General Government declines to aid us, and we are in the grasp of a money monopoly.

I have now letters from parties in Toledo, a city that is in need of more banks, asking me to secure them currency for a national bank. The Government bonds are ready to deposit. These bonds are worth more than their face value in gold in all the markets of this country and Europe, and yet this currency cannot be supplied even at the rate of 90 per cent. I applied to the Comptroller of the Currency to secure some currency from national banks that have wound up; but this currency cannot be had. It is in the hands of New York brokers, and is offered at 5 per cent. premium.

Now, suppose my Toledo friends, having read the able arguments delivered here upon the evils of our present system, desire to bank on a gold basis. They therefore sell their bonds for gold, and attempt to bank under the State laws of Ohio. Here comes your 10 per cent tax and drives them out of the field. My constituents are therefore practically prohibited from banking under either State or national laws. Their only privilege is to borrow money of eastern money-lenders at exorbitant rates of interest, which they are now doing. They are compelled to contribute a large share of the profits of their business to eastern capitalists.

There is no defense for such a system as this. It is an outrageous oppression. The Eastern States have an excess of circulation of national-bank currency of over $80,000,000. Ohio has a deficiency of $1,509,456, and Illinois a deficiency of $6,331,221; Massachusetts alone has an excess of $40,000,000; and even the little State of Rhode Island has an excess of $10,635,793. The city of Providence, Rhode Island, has a national-bank circulation of $9,483,710; while the city of Toledo, Ohio, a city with an immense jobbing trade and a great commercial mart, has but $1,337,400. Hartford, Connecticut, a finished town, with 37,180 inhabitants, owns $4,435,700 of national-bank circulation; while Milwaukee, the metropolis of Wisconsin, with over 71,000 population, has only $611,500. The little town of Fall River, Massachusetts, has nearly two millions of this circulation, while Lawrence, Kansas, has but $151,500.

Take two States, Ohio and Connecticut. Ohio is only authorized to issue $39,818,983 of this currency, Connecticut issues $33,047,632; and yet Ohio has three times the property and five times the population of Connecticut. I submit a comparison, as shown by the census of 1870:

Items.	Connecticut.	Ohio.
Population	537,454	2,665,260
Engaged in agriculture	43,663	397,024
In trade and transportation	24,720	78,547
Mechanical and mining	86,344	197,010
Professional and personal	38,704	168,308
Valuation of property	$747,631,524	$2,225,430,300
Taxation	$6,061,843	$23,526,548

The six New England States, with a population of 3,487,924, with a property valuation of $4,009,875,247, have a circulation of $110,489,966, while the twenty-three Western and Southern States, with a population of 24,217,341, with a property valuation of $12,770,112,683, have a circulation of only $111,409,156.

The Representatives of western constituencies who advocate the equitable rights of their section are denounced as repudiators, or as too ignorant to comprehend the complex science of finance.

PUBLIC SENTIMENT IN OHIO.

It is claimed also that public sentiment, even in the West, is against more currency. I venture the opinion that four-fifths of all the active business men of Ohio favor more currency. I am confident such is the case in Northwestern Ohio, my own section.

During the progress of this debate all history has been ransacked by contractionists for evidence to fortify their positions. All the obscure pamphleteers of the last century, whose works have drifted down through cheap auctions to the Congressional Library have been dusted out and doctored, and brought to the front. I have no objection to this resurrection of these dead voices; but in the light of the experience, knowledge, genius, and practical statesmanship of to-day, why should we seek oracles of obscure tombstones?

We have learned something of transportation since Moses traveled for forty years in the wilderness. We have learned something of electricity since Franklin touched the womb of the lightning, and I believe we have learned something of government and finance since George III and Adam Smith.

McCullough, in his able contribution to the Encyclopædia Britannica, in speaking of Adam Smith, and other writers so often quoted here, says:

> The opinions and theories of the eminent professors who have written on political economy have impeded the progress of the science, and created a popular distrust in its established conclusions.

Serene in the consciousness of this distrust, I desire to present the views of some living practical financiers of my own State.

First, I submit a letter from one of the most successful business men in Ohio, a gentleman who has done more than any other man to develop the iron and coal industries of the State; a gentleman who has never read Ricardo or Adam Smith, but who has absorbed some very sound political economy in a long and successful business career:

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, March 7, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I think common sense and business principles will apply to the management of the national affairs as it would to a man's own business operations.

In the first place, the present generation have been taxed heavily to put down the rebellion; they should not be taxed to pay the present debt.

Let the Government fund the debt long loan fifty to sixty years at 4 to 5 per cent., pay it when we have increased in population to an extent that I dare not name. Give us a free-banking law. The people are constantly talking about railroad monopolies; there are no monopolies in this country equal to the present banking monopoly.

What have the special few done that the Government should bestow extraordinary privileges upon them, receive their bonds, keep them safe, pay them the interest upon them, and then give them 90 per cent. of circulation to loan the business community at high interest? Money is too scarce and dear for business purposes. Money should not be worth more than 6 to 7 per cent. We want cheap money instead of pauper labor.

If I can make more or am better satisfied to bank than to mine coal or make pig-iron, I want the Government to extend to me the privilege they do to my neighbors, on the same terms and with the same restrictions.

I believe the low rate of interest bonds, convertible when the holder wanted to use money for a special purpose, would work well.

The South had none of our money in 1864. Since then four million negroes have been freed, and have to be paid for their labor, and large amounts of money are required to do their business operations.

We have seventy thousand miles of railroad as against twenty thousand a few years ago, population increased ten to fifteen millions within a few years, are mining four times as much coal, and making four times as much iron.

The seventy thousand miles of railroad are alive with people with a large amount of money in their pockets to pay traveling expenses.

Now, what are we asked to do? Simply this: with large increase and growing business, to manage proportionately with less than one-half the money we had a few years ago. It is simply ridiculous, and is not governed by any business principles. We should have money in proportion to growth of business and population.

Money may be plenty in New York, but it is not in Ohio. Our manufactures and mining are paralyzed.

Give us less taxes and more money and our own market, that we may live within ourselves for a few years, and we will be able to pay the debt and not feel it.

Yours, very respectfully,

C. H. ANDREWS.

General I. R. SHERWOOD,
Washington, D. C.

Also, a letter from the editor of the Western Reserve Chronicle, one of the oldest and ablest papers of the Connecticut Reserve of Ohio, supplemented with some comments by the Cleveland Herald. I do this for two reasons: first, to indicate popular feeling in the richest and most densely populated region of the State; secondly, to show Connecticut theorists how their brothers "to the manor born" expand and develop and liberalize when transplanted to the broad hill-tops and inviting valleys of Ohio:

WARREN, OHIO, February 14, 1874.

DEAR FRIEND: I hear of no one demanding or desiring resumption, save bankers, bondholders, and perhaps persons of large cash means, who hope, of course, to enlarge the purchasing power of their mind by the shrinkage of values resulting from resumption and contraction. I think the general desire of the producing, manufacturing, mercantile, and ordinary business classes is for more rather than less of the greenback currency. I believe the article inclosed, copied into and favorably commented on by the Cleveland Herald of a recent date, reflects the sentiment of this region. I submit it to you as giving in my opinion a fair reflex of the mind of a large majority of the people of Ohio.

WILLIAM RITEZEL.

Hon. I. R. SHERWOOD,
Washington, D. C.

The following is the article from the Cleveland Herald, referred to by Mr. Ritezel:

The Specie Hobby.—Under that head the Warren (Trumbull County) Chronicle holds a very sensible editorial talk with its readers; a talk that should be overheard by Congressmen. Great commercial centers, so called, have more influence at Washington than their relative importance entitles them to, and much more influence than their measure of sound, practical, business common sense entitles them to. The men at these great centers are enabled to concentrate instantly an amount of strength that is denied the country, while the visions of such men are very narrow and their ideas of cause and effect extend only to the curb-stone of their own stock market. The Chronicle says:

"Senators and Representatives with whom specie payment is a specialty misap prehend public sentiment, if in their efforts to contract our circulating medium they imagine that the people are in the least out of patience because Congress does not proceed 'to fulfill their promises to the people to make greenbacks redeemable in gold.' It is surprising to observe with what desperate tenacity some of our lawmakers cling to financial theories exploded by the test of practical experience. These gentlemen appear to think that there is some occult, omnipotent virtue in a specie dollar for which the people are hungering and thirsting, and, if not furnished soon, will die of pecuniary starvation. Probably if Congressmen mingled more with the masses, to learn their views and ascertain the popular demands and necessities, instead of consulting almost exclusively with bankers and bondholders, and importers of foreign manufactures, they would more truly represent their constituencies on this important question than they do."

The Chronicle then briefly reviews the last dozen years, and points to the fact of our unparalleled prosperity under the legal-tender issue; how that feature of finance was assailed, how triumphantly it demonstrated its benefits. And the Chronicle goes on thus:

"The fact is that the people are perfectly satisfied with the present currency, and do not demand a resumption of specie payments or a contraction of circulating medium. We aver without fear of successful contradiction that a petition in favor of a reasonable increase of currency or greenbacks can be circulated through General GARFIELD'S congressional district, and through all the district north of the national road—supposed to be more especially represented by Senator SHERMAN—and ninety-nine hundredths of the people will petition for more greenbacks. * * We believe we speak right from the mouth and hearts of the people, and reflect the views of the manufacturing, trading, and producing classes generally, who are the bone and sinew of the country."

ELEMENTS TO BE CONSIDERED IN FIXING VOLUME OF CURRENCY.

The demands of currency are regulated, first, by the character and amount of business transactions; secondly, by the average earnings per capita of the producing classes; thirdly, by the solidity or density of population.

To the first proposition it can be plead that the people of this country in proportion to population average more general employment than those of either France, Germany, or England. We have fewer paupers, fewer criminals, fewer non-producers, and no large standing armies. The average earnings per capita are more than double those of either England, France, or the German Empire. In density of population we have an average of but two hundred and seventy-two persons to the square mile, while England has about five thousand, the German Empire over four thousand, and France over three thousand. It is evident that sparsely settled regions and sections remote from banks need more currency per capita than regions densely populated. This is a self-evident proposition.

The statement that our currency is excessive as compared with other leading nations is found to be erroneous.

The following table, showing the total currency volume in England,

Germany, France, and the United States, throws a flood of light upon this statement:

Total currency volume of the United States	$869,000,000
Less gold and paper reserves	200,000,000
Total actual circulation	669,000,000
Circulation per capita	16 72
Total currency volume of England	884,943,000
Less reserves	112,259,000
Total actual circulation	772,684,000
Circulation per capita	24 28
Total currency volume of Germany	1,296,000,000
Less reserve	205,000,000
Total actual circulation	1,091,000,000
Circulation per capita	26 80
Total currency volume of France	$1,650,000,000
Less gold and silver reserve in bank	540,000,000
Total actual circulation	1,250,000,000
Circulation per capita	34 72

It is seen that our currency is eight dollars per capita less than England, ten dollars less than Germany, and eighteen dollars less than France.

RESUMPTION NOT PRACTICABLE NOW.

I desire to call the attention of the contractionists who think gold is now cheap enough to resume to an editorial in the London Economist of October last. When this article was written gold was at a premium of 10 per cent.

We know by experience how that premium may be effaced. If no more greenbacks are issued, the augmenting trade of the country will of itself raise the value of the paper; but this is a severe and painful process. Conducting a large trade with an identical currency is the same as conducting an equal trade with a diminished currency. In both cases there is dear money; that is, a high rate of interest and a lowered scale of prices; people have to pay more for what they borrow and receive less for what they sell, and the consequent suffering to trade is always considerable. It can be borne by America, we know, for she has already borne it; she has already reduced the premium on gold by a much larger amount than that which remains to be reduced, but the effort has been great, and this panic is in great part in consequence of it. Nor are our second or third conditions satisfied. The store of gold now held by the American Government is altogether inadequate to the resumption of cash payments, and the premium on gold must in our judgment be still further reduced before specie payments can be safely recommended.

Let our book economists who fortify themselves with English authority in finance digest the three objections just presented. Let these impracticables study the situation as it is rather than as it ought to be, and they will discover that their theories have no application now, and that their principles have neither basis nor vitality. The greenback must remain our only currency until increased prosperity and renewed national life with enlarged revenues shall have enabled us to cancel our foreign indebtedness, and the flow of the precious metals shall be to us and not from us. This is the work of time under the most prosperous days and wholesome laws. At present, with our industries crippled, our trade paralyzed, and so much labor unemployed, the first business should be to restore confidence.

THE FARMERS' INTEREST.

Hon. Amasa Walker has sent some Boston logic to the president of the Illinois State grange, repeating the oft-exploded theory that it is the farmers of the West who are suffering most by the so-called inflated or depreciated currency. Mr. Walker recapitulates how the farmers suffer, as follows:

First. From the low or gold prices of their own products, and the high or currency products of all other commodities.

Second. By the larger profits and higher taxes they are compelled to pay.

For all these there is no remedy but the restoration of the standard of value by a return to specie payments.

This Massachusetts book economist is completely refuted by the practical Massachusetts financier who now occupies a seat in the Senate. I quote from Mr. BOUTWELL'S speech on finance delivered in the Senate January 22, 1874:

I mean to say, that if the currency of the country be so depreciated, and if it be held at a particular point for so long a time that the business of the country, the prices of labor, and the products of labor shall have become accommodated to the existing condition of things, then there are no substanstial evils. * * * The proposition is, that in consequence of a depreciated currency, the farmers of the West, whose products in whole or in part are exported to foreign countries, where the currency is coin, are in a worse condition relatively than they would be if the currency of this country were coin. * * * If, as an example, you consider wheat, which is a great product of the West, you may assume, as a fundamental proposition in regard to its price, that it can never be less at any point in this country than its price in Liverpool, less the costs and profits of transportation. If that be so, then the price of a bushel of wheat at Saint Louis, measured in coin, the currency of England, is less than the price measured in coin at Liverpool by the cost of transportation there, and only by that, and that entirely independent of the fact as to the depreciation of our own currency. For our own present purpose we deal in the currency of the world, and if wheat be worth fifty pence a bushel at Liverpool, and the cost of transporting it there, profits and all, be ten pence, it is worth forty pence in coin in Saint Louis; and it is worth that because a party in Saint Louis can send it to Liverpool and can get his coin in Liverpool, and after paying all expenses he will have forty pence in hand for his bushel of wheat.

Now, if this person wishes to buy sugar or coffee in return, he can buy his sugar or his coffee with coin in the markets of exportation; and if the cost of a pound of sugar in coin laid down in Saint Louis, brought from Havana and paid for in coin, is ten cents, he has established the relation between his product exported and the necessaries of life imported, and that upon a coin basis. * * * To what the man sells, measured in coin, is added in currency the difference between coin and currency in commercial value, and to what he buys is added the difference between coin and currency in their commercial value; and he neither loses nor gains by the process.

The argument of the erudite Walker can be answered briefly. If the farmer sells his grain for gold on a gold basis, of course he realizes gold or gold value. If he buys his goods for depreciated paper at an enhanced price because of the depreciated paper, he realizes the difference in price by the premium on his gold before he makes his purchases.

By the argument of the so-called political economists we are led to believe that the legitimate market for the surplus products of the western farmer is England, and that he is dependent for his articles of consumption upon the importers. It can be demonstrated that a comparatively small portion of the grain crop of the West finds its way to English mouths, and articles imported are principally luxuries not consumed by western farmers.

Statistics show that Great Britain raises five-eighths of all the cereals she consumes, leaving three-eighths to be drawn from foreign soil. What proportion of this three-eighths is supplied by the United States? It is stated by competent authority that our grain export for 1872 was the largest in the decade. In that year we exported to Great Britain in wheat, rye, oats, and barley 26,343,951 bushels. The shortage of the grain crop in Great Britain that year was 186,000,000 bushels. Thus it will be seen that we supplied England with about 14 per cent. of her shortage.

The grain crop of Ohio in 1872 was over 150,000,000 bushels, or sufficient to supply the entire export trade to Great Britain for six years; and Ohio is not the greatest grain-producing State.

The aggregate grain crop of the grain-growing States in 1872 was 1,777,847,600 bushels. But 26,000,000 of this immense product was sold for the coveted British gold, or less than 1¾ per cent. When we consider these statistics we are better prepared to estimate the audacity of the assumption that the farmers of the West are dependent upon Great Britain, either to make a market or fix the market price of their products.

If the price of wheat in the West is regulated by the price in Liverpool, as the book economists all teach us, how is it that last August, when wheat in Chicago from the 6th to the 26th of September fell 30 cents per bushel, the price of wheat in Liverpool advanced during the same period, to wit, from 11*s*. 10*d*. to 12*s*. 6*d*. per hundredweight, September 6 to 12*s*. 7*d*. to 12*s*. 9*d*. per hundred-weight September 26.

As these statistics, drawn from the market reports, fail to fortify the theory of the book economists, I may be allowed to say that it was probably owing to the fact that the greenback, which serves the admirable purpose of moving the crops, was locked up in the vaults of the panic-stricken banks of New York. It was owing to our cast-iron system of finance, that could not convert a gold bond into a currency promise, even to save the nation from bankruptcy.

By the failure to secure greenbacks to move the crops to market before close of navigation the farmers of the West suffered a loss greater than the value of the entire grain export to Great Britain. The bulk of the western grain crop of 1873 was marketed below the cost of production. The high rates of interest paid yearly by western grain buyers to eastern banks for currency is so much deducted from the price of grain. This is the farmer's forced contribution to the eastern monopoly of money.

Here I desire to quote from a petition sent to the Senate and House by 200 business men of New York, and presented in the Senate by Senator LOGAN on the 17th of March:

The experience of the last few years, especially in the fall, when the agricultural products of the year must be marketed, has demonstrated that there is insufficient currency to do the legitimate business of the country. Hence there has been increasing stringency in the market, causing great distress and alarm, by which money-lenders have been able to profit for weeks and months to the extent of ½ to ¾ of 1 per cent. per day, and in extreme cases even as high as 2 per cent. per day, or from 45 to 700 per cent. per annum, and this in the money center of the continent. This has enabled a few men at such times, by locking up money, to aggravate the difficulty, and thus command their own terms, not a few of whom are now asking your honorable body to contract the currency that they may more effectually ply their infamous traffic.

These causes produced the late disastrous and ruinous panic, which will undoubtedly be reproduced with still more prostrating effects unless relief be afforded.

Your petitioners therefore respectfully ask that the volume of the currency be increased, especially the legal-tenders, and that provision of elasticity be made, so that business may again be safely resumed.

Western farmers will not be humbugged with the idea that contraction and more squeezing is what they need. Neither will they be deluded by the ingenious sophistries of those learned economists, on the beauties of selling high at home and buying cheap abroad.

POLITICAL ECONOMISTS REVIEWED.

If we admit that the eminent scholars and patrons of English nobility, who have fortified the English system with their speculations, thoroughly understood the subject of finance, we have but one duty to perform: bend all the energies of legislation to secure enough of the gold of King Solomon to say to every emaciated greenback "Thy redeemer liveth."

But while recognizing the fact that political economy is a science, we do not thereby admit that the celebrated Englishmen thoroughly understood it. Political economy is the science of the laws that regulate the production, distribution, and consumption of the products of industry, called wealth. Political economy is not the science of speculation, but of fact and experiment. The political economy of the books assumes that no medium for the exchange of commodities or values is competent to produce wealth, but some substance which of itself has value. It is argued that the greenback is a mere promise to pay money; that it only represents debt.

A distinguished Senator defines a greenback to be

A mendicant, which the Government quarters upon its creditors in times of peace, simply by assuring them that when they meet a creditor they may in turn transfer the mendicant upon him.

John Stuart Mill says:

Paper currency is not money, because it is not a legal tender and does not close transactions.

The same author, in the same chapter, says:

Bills of exchange and checks circulate as money and perform all the functions of money.

These are remarkable distinctions without a difference.

The paper currency described by Mill is based upon the assumption that the holder of the note can obtain the gold by presenting it at the bank of issue; the bill of exchange assumes that the holder may obtain the gold by presenting it where payable. And yet, according to Mill, the one performs all the functions of money, and the other does not.

Amasa Walker, in his Wealth of Nations, says:

Our legal-tender money transfers debts, but cannot pay them. The creditor may accept the promises of the Government in place of that of an individual, but he receives no value.

Mann, in his admirable work on Paper Money, says this statement is erroneous, in not recognizing the vital fact that "such notes are as much money in the United States as gold in other countries."

Money derives its force from common consent. If men or governments choose to coin credits instead of gold, and this credit performs all the functions of money, it is as potent to discharge debt and to produce wealth as coined gold. The same remarkable Walker, just referred to, puts a perfect nightmare of statistics into column to prove that when money is plenty interest is high. Consequently scarce money means cheap interest. On this theory a short apple crop means cheap cider, and the hog cholera is the forerunner of cheap hams. If the grangers can only be made to see it, the true solution of the cheap transportation problem is to make a bonfire of about half the freight-cars on our railroads, thereby reducing the freight tariff 50 per cent.

Whether we denounce the greenback as a mendicant or renounce it as a dishonored promise, it was a potent element in war, and is to-day the great mainspring moving all the machinery of Government. As an element of civilization it has taught us that there are other elements than gold and silver by which the affairs of men and nations may be conducted. And it is bound to stay with us in defiance of all the economies of all the Englishmen. Our own country, in war and peace, for the past ten years has been conducted in defiance of every principle of military strategy and political economy laid down by the books. In war the most successful and brilliant military achievements were in direct violation of all military book strategy. Grant's campaign against Vicksburgh, and Sherman's campaign from Rocky Face to Savannah, were both in opposition to military precedents. In peace we have been operating under an exclusively paper currency, and depreciated at that. This, according to the books, is fatal. We have been operating under a protective tariff, which, according to the English economies, is fatal; and yet we have flourished under both.

After Grant had taken Vicksburgh, and "Sherman had marched to the sea," after the iron-clad Monitor had met the Merrimac in Hampton Roads, what were all the books on military and naval strategy worth? And to-day, after ten years of substantial and healthful growth in invention, in manufactures, in material wealth, in population, in moral grandeur, what do all the books of all the Englishmen amount to?

The Declaration of Independence was not written in accordance with English precedent; and when the young Republic was started, as a feeble contribution to a new system of political economy, there was no celebrated Englishman to give it a send-off, or a god-send, with a book. And to-day, with nearly a century of successful history behind us—a century born the year Adam Smith sent into the world his Wealth of Nations—how marvelous it is that not one Englishman has fortified the Republic with a book. And yet we have not seriously felt the loss.

INCONSISTENCY OF THE CONTRACTIONISTS.

By the way, how is it that the political economists on this floor and elsewhere, who are for nothing but gold dollars, are also for a protective tariff? The celebrated Englishmen who have furnished so many ready-made economies are much clearer and stronger on the free-trade doctrine than on the functions of money and the science of finance. How is it that this concentration of English brain for one hundred years, demonstrating the fallacy of protection has failed to carry conviction, while the many loose and disjointed dissertations on the science of finance have made such an overwhelming conviction? It seems to me the argument for contraction is only fortified by the interest of a section, and does not embrace the theory of the greatest good for all sections.

WHAT PAPER MONEY HAS DONE.

The past ten years, during which we have violated so much political economy, has been the most prosperous decade in our brief century of history. In these ten years—nearly one-half of which were desolate with the havoc of civil war—the aggregate wealth of the country has almost doubled.

By the Federal census of 1860 we were worth in round numbers a trifle over $16,000,000,000; in 1870 we were worth over $30,000,000,000. In the decade our export trade increased over 60 per cent., our manufacturing capital over 100 per cent., and the value of manufactured articles over 140 per cent. All this, notwithstanding the immense destruction of property by civil war, valued at eight thousand millions, slave property valued at twelve hundred millions, the killing and maiming of a million men, the payment for an average period of three years of over one million men—not to produce wealth, but to destroy it—the payment of immense bounties and pensions, paying the interest on our bonded debt, paying over three hundred and fifty millions of the principal, and sustaining taxation as no new nation was ever taxed before. The result is as marvelous as it is magnificent.

What is the secret of this, the grandest contribution thus far in the history of civilization to that great science of political economy? The secret is this. We are a nation of immense resources. The Government has extended to all her children her generous credit. With this credit the genius, the wonderful activity, and the invincible energy of the American people have had full swing. With this credit we have dug coal, smelted iron ores, fashioned the metals, fabricated the machines, built towns and cities, and gemmed the land with thriving and busy industries. With this credit we have corduroyed the land with railroads, made populous States of prairies and forests, and empires of States. This progress has been healthful, this development has been substantial, this wealth is tangible. It has been an era of universal prosperity. And yet we have not had, except in the Pacific States, a dollar of gold, the so-called currency of the world, in circulation. The greenback, now so fiercely denounced upon this floor and elsewhere, was our only currency.

How could we grow so in defiance of all the theories of all the Englishmen who have incubated so laboriously so many political economies? How dare we prosper so in the face of the great fact that gold, the only measure of value, had left the young Republic like a coward, and hid its face for an entire decade among the monarchies?

All the political economists say that paper currency always depreciates in value, and yet our currency is worth more to-day in the midst of a panic than ever before. All the political economists say that a paper currency once issued, the tendency to inflation cannot be restored; and yet since 1865 we have reduced the volume of our currency over four hundred millions.

PAPER MONEY OF REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENTS.

The French assignats, the continental money of the Revolution, and confederate scrip, are cited as evidence that money issued upon credit must eventually collapse. The French assignats, issued upon the confiscated property of the church, were the offspring of the French revolution. They depreciated when the Austrian and Prussian veterans prepared to cross the French frontier; and when England joined the alliance, of course they went down. The continental money of the American Revolution was born of necessity, and utterly failed because it was fortified with no central government, and represented no property. The confederate money never promised to pay anything until six months after the treaty of peace, and the treaty of peace has not yet been signed.

The John Law schemes and the South Sea Island bubbles that are injected into this discussion to illustrate the ultimate collapse of our greenback currency, are not even respectable scarecrows.

The greenback is fortified by all the powers of a strong central Government, and its redemption is pledged by the united property and resources of forty million people with over thirty billions of realized wealth. The greenback has been the most potent element in the march of empire, and the voice that seeks to dishonor it is inspired by the sordid greed of those who would speculate upon the misfortunes of their countrymen.

The abuses to which paper money has been subjected in times past by revolutionary and unstable governments is brought forward now as an argument against the greenback. Because the issue of paper money is liable to abuse, is not a wholesome objection to our system. The power of the people to make laws through Congress often leads to unwholesome legislation; yet this is no valid argument against a republic.

MONEY PANICS CONSIDERED.

If there had never been a money panic before the advent of the "greenback" the present howl and scowl of the book economists would be better heeded.

Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, in commending a system of banking based upon gold, says of the Bank of Amsterdam, which failed soon after the book was published:

At Amsterdam no point of faith is better established than that for every guilder circulated as bank money there is a corresponding guilder of gold or silver to be found in the treasures of the bank.

When Adam Smith wrote this the bank which he commended, and whose system of political economy he indorsed, had been in a bankrupt condition for fifty years. The deposits of the bank in 1775, four years before it failed, and at the time Adam Smith wrote, amounted to thirty-five millions and its annual business was four thousand millions.

If Adam Smith were living in this age of newspaper audacity, and had ever commended Jay Cooke's system of banks, whose failure has not entailed a tithe of the loss and suffering caused by the failure of the Bank of Amsterdam, he would now be quoted as a profound scoundrel rather than as a profound thinker or political economist. There were more bank failures in this country under the old system based upon gold than bank-note reporters could record, and the power to detect wild-cat and counterfeit money was an important feature in a business man's education; and there was never a decade without a panic.

ENGLAND'S SYSTEM DISCUSSED.

The English system of finance is held up here by the contractionists as a model. And yet England had panics in 1784, in 1793, in 1810, in 1819, in 1825, in 1837, in 1847, in 1857, in 1862, and in 1866. Still, it is no fair criterion to compare this nation with England. England is a credit nation; we are a debtor nation. The wealth of England is realized; ours is hidden in soil and mine, and is to be developed. England has been full of gold for two centuries, and is constantly augmenting her supply from Australia, South America, and the United States; we are constantly parting with our already meager supply to pay our debts.

Until recently England made iron for half the world, and for nearly a century she enjoyed almost a monopoly in manufacture. During all the period of her war with France, from 1797 to 1815, England preserved the mastery of the seas, and during all that time she supplied the continent of Europe with her manufactured articles. We must not forget that about this time science and engineering were just coming to the front, with the steam-engine, the spinning-jenny, and the power-loom. These inventions, so successfully applied, gave England a mastery over all the nations of the Continent that defied both fate and fortune. She had within her reach the raw cotton of America, the flax of Russia, the sugar and coffee of the West Indies, and the rich commerce of the exhaustless East. She had her American, her African, her Australian, her Asiatic empires, all contributing to her wealth, all pouring gold and treasures into her lap.

Mark the contrast between England in 1819 and our own country now. During the last decade our gold supply has been rapidly depreciating. During the decade from 1863 to 1872 we have exported $386,752,273 in gold and silver, and imported but $160,709,492. With seven hundred and fifty millions of paper money and about one hundred and forty millions of gold in the country, the proposition to resume in times of general confidence would be impolitic. To attempt it in time of a panic, is criminal folly.

The wise men of the East who are for specie payments now or nothing, claim that a demand for gold here will draw gold from other nations, and that, if necessary, we can realize gold from the sale of Government bonds. Two bills have been introduced in the Senate, proposing that the Government borrow gold in the markets of the world to redeem our greenbacks. The advocates of this remarkable scheme are reminded by Senator BOUTWELL that it is entirely impracticable. I quote from a late speech of that Senator:

When the negotiations were going on in London for the sale of the largest amount of United States bonds that has ever been sold there at one time, it was foreseen by the Bank of England that a quantity of coin would accumulate as the proceeds of these bonds to the credit of the United States. As a matter of fact there was an accumulation of about $21,000,000. The Bank of England, foreseeing that there would be an accumulation of coin to the credit of the United States which might be taken away bodily in specie, gave notice to the officers of the Treasury Department of the United States that the power of that institution would be arrayed against the whole proceeding unless we gave a pledge that the coin should not be removed, and that we would reinvest it in the bonds of the United States as they were offered in the markets of London. We were compelled to do it. * * * There are in the nine great banks of Europe only $600,000,000 in specie. That specie is held as a reserve with reference to their local business and with reference to the great transactions that take place between the countries of the continent of Europe and Great Britain. I may say, without disparaging the authors of these propositions, that it is useless for Congress to waste time upon legislation looking in that direction.

There is another fact, known to all. We recovered at Geneva an award against Great Britain of $15,500,000. When this claim was maturing the banking and commercial classes of Great Britain induced the government to interpose, and by diplomatic arrangements through the State Department here, operating upon the Treasury Department, secured the transfer of securities and thus avoided the transfer of coin. In the presence of these facts, is it to be assumed for a moment that we can go into the markets of the world and purchase coin with which we can redeem one, two, three, or four million outstanding legal-tender notes?

The objections so clearly and forcibly presented by the late Secretary of the Treasury are insurmountable. The proposition is not worthy of serious consideration.

THE EFFECT OF SPECIE RESUMPTION IN ENGLAND.

What was the result of specie resumption in England; notwithstanding her ample preparation for the event and her abundant treasures of the precious metals? I read from Doubleday's Financial History of England:

The currency bill of 1819 (Peel's bill to restore cash payments) was passed at the instance of a committee among whom were all the parliamentary dabblers in political economy, of whom Peel was chairman. Horner, chairman of the bullion committee of 1810, was dead; but in his stead they had Ricardo, a rich Jew stock-jobber, who having made an immense fortune by the worst species of gambling, had also contrived to obtain a reputation by the publication of some books on political economy. Peel was pitched upon for this unfortunate service mainly because he was a young man of aspiring pretensions and vast wealth.

Let us inquire how England was affected by resumption of specie payments. I quote from Doubleday's Financial History of England in describing the situation the year after specie payments were resumed:

The distress, ruin, and bankruptcy which now took place were universal, affecting both the great interests of land and trade. In hundreds of cases, from the tremendous reduction in the price of land, the estates barely sold for as much as would pay off the mortgages, and hence the owners were stripped of all and made beggars. The tables of both houses of Parliament were loaded with petitions, detailing scenes of hardship and destitution appalling in the extreme.

It was an era of suffering, destitution, and crime, and the whole land was one scene of confusion, dismay, and bankruptcy.

The price of grain went on slowly and progressively falling for a decade, when, in 1833, wheat was selling for four shillings a bushel. Prices were, upon the whole, lower than they had been for half a century before, and agricultural distress pervaded the land from one end to the other.

From the effects of this first decade of destitution and suffering, which the attempt at specie resumption precipitated in 1821, the laboring and struggling classes in England have never recovered. Her industrial classes have been kept always on the verge of want. Pauperism and crime have increased, and are increasing with appalling rapidity, while wealth is rolling in huge masses controlled by a few. We see the name of yeoman forgotten in England, and instead of a land of diffused wealth, it has been metamorphosed into a land of criminals and discontented paupers, lorded over by gigantic moneyed aristocrats. Thirty thousand people own all the land of England, and one hundred and fifty men and women own half.

Ruskin, in one of his late lectures, says:

Though England is deafened with spinning-wheels, her people have not clothes; though she is black with digging of fuel, her people die of cold; though she has sold her soul for gain, yet they die of hunger.

Before we take England for illustration let us look further into the statistics.

The Bank of England resumed specie payments in May, 1821, under the act of 1819, (Peel's bill.) One year before specie payments were resumed the Bank of England notes were only depreciated about 2½ per cent. The bank held in its vaults £11,869,000 in gold to redeem a circulation of £22,884,000. Yet with this 50 per cent. of gold to redeem its notes, at a time, too, when there was no speculation in gold as a commodity as at this time, this amount was found insufficient; for in 1825 the bank was drained of its specie. A disastrous panic was the result. This was only stayed by the Bank of England issuing £5,000,000 (equal to $25,000,000) of bank-notes in excess of its charter allowance. McLeod, in his work on Banking, says:

Had not this policy been pursued an entire destruction of commercial credits would have been the result.

Our own disastrous panic could doubtless have been averted by the issue of even one-half the forty-four million reserve; but I am not discussing that question now.

Again, in England in 1837, after President Jackson had refused to sign the charter for the renewal of the United States Bank, and laws were enacted for cash banking by the States, there was a drain of coin from the vaults of the Bank of England, which caused a panic in England, in which all the great commercial houses in trade with the United States were swept away. The drain of the precious metals was not only felt in England but all over the Continent. In 1838 and 1839 this drain was so aggravated in England, that she was compelled to borrow money from the Bank of France. This alone saved the bank from utter ruin; and it was only the fact that the weak condition of the bank was not known that it was saved at all. The bank averages of bullion for the last four months, ending with 1839, were less than £3,000,000. In this country, in this age of daylight and telegraph and newspaper inquisitions, such a concern would not stand for thirty hours.

HOW PANICS ARE RELIEVED IN ENGLAND.

It seems strange that the contractionists are making war upon the Secretary of the Treasury for issuing a portion of the forty-four million reserve, when the Bank of England has always adopted a similar policy to avert a crisis in Great Britain.

In the panic of 1857 the Bank of England increased its loans in violation of its charter in a very few days to the amount of $60,000,000; and during the panic of 1866 to the amount of $75,000,000. As the Secretary of the Treasury has only imitated in a small way the policy of the Bank of England, it is contemptible in the book economists to denounce him.

The Bank of England, when specie payments were resumed, held in its vaults 50 per cent. of gold to redeem its circulation; and yet, in order to maintain it, the bank was compelled to reduce its circulation in one year £7,000,000, and its discounts to merchants from nine to four million pounds, or over 50 per cent. A like contraction of credits in this country would bankrupt half the business men, East as well as West.

If England's trade and industry were paralyzed for two entire decades by this policy after her ample preparation, do the political economists think this country, with no preparation and no adequate gold supply, should imitate England's example now?

A monarchy may crush out the laboring and industrial classes, but a republic dare not and cannot.

The notes of the Bank of France are slightly depreciated, notwithstanding the fact that less than $600,000,000 of these notes are in circulation, and the other important fact that she has $800,000,000 of gold coin.

In this country there has never been a time when we had 20 per cent. of gold and silver to circulation. The percentage of specie to circulation in 1859, two years after the disastrous panic of 1857, was less than 15 per cent.; and the percentage of specie to circulation that year exceeded that of any year since 1842.

Since 1859 the legitimate demand for money has almost tripled, and our gold supply has fallen off one hundred and fifty millions. Specie payments are impossible; contraction is ruin.

CONCLUSION.

Let us put aside as unworthy of consideration the threadbare assertion that a wholesome money supply will demoralize the people by engendering speculation. This argument is based upon the theory that the business men of this country cannot be trusted with their own business.

Currency is credit. This credit Webster defined as the vital air of modern commerce. The West to-day, with untold wealth to be developed, stands pleading for this credit. With this credit confidence will be restored, trade will revive, industry will start again her busy fingers, and the car of progress roll onward as before. Without it, the solemn proclamation must go forth that we have reached the highest limit of our development.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson.

LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 22, 1854, reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claims in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT LOUIS AND ILLINOIS BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the construction of the Saint Louis and Illinois bridge across the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 8, 1872, to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department, certain reports; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to print if the committee should so decide.

SETTLERS ON DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. ORR, by unanimous consent, presented a report from the Committee on the Public Lands upon the bill (H. R. No. 1142) in relation to settlers on the Des Moines River lands; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

IMPROVEMENT OF OAKLAND HARBOR, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the common council of the city of Oakland, California, relative to the improvement of the harbor of that city for commercial purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY COUNCIL CHAMBER, CITY HALL,
Oakland, California, January 19, 1874.

The common council of the city of Oakland duly convened for official business this 19th day of January, A. D. 1874—the president and all the members being present—on motion of Councilman Spaulding, seconded by Councilman Warner, it is resolved to memorialize the honorable Congress of the United States upon the importance of improving the harbor of Oakland for commercial purposes, and for the reasons which the following recital of facts will show:

First. The commerce of the United States, in traffic and travel, as connected with the Pacific coast and the great continental roads, is now and has been for several years carried on over the water-front of the city of Oakland, in the State of California.

Second. That while this commercial business is rapidly increasing, it had already attained in 1872-'73 the aggregate of four hundred and fifty thousand tons of general freight; and in the year ending July 1, 1873, no less than one hundred and ten ships were loaded at the Oakland wharf with California wheat, amounting to one hundred and sixty-one thousand tons, to be distributed to the markets of the world.

Third. The transit of passengers from Asiatic and other foreign ports, from San Francisco and from the cities east of the Rocky Mountains, arriving and departing at Oakland by the great overland railroads, amounted to an aggregate of sixty-seven thousand souls for the year ending January 31, 1873; the local travel by ferry-boat between Oakland and San Francisco shows a rapid yearly increase, and now requires the constant use of half-hourly boats and trains, carrying a daily average of five thousand persons, equal to a yearly total of nearly two million passengers. During the year 1873 the treasure from all sources in the interior of the State of California and from the Nevada mines, reaching the Oakland dock, amounted to no less than $31,000,000 in value. The two staples of the Pacific slope, wheat and bullion, find readiest access to deep water upon the Oakland water-front. The location of the city of Oakland relative to the range of mountains known as the Coast Range of California, and the great Bay of San Francisco, is such as to make the Oakland water-front the nearest practicable railroad approach to deep water in the bay, alike adjacent to the city of San Francisco and the Pacific Ocean.

And whereas the present wharf, although erected by the railroad companies at a cost of nearly $1,000,000, can only be regarded as a temporary structure, and entirely inadequate to the present and prospective demands of commerce: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the common council of the city of Oakland, in the State of California, do hereby most respectfully call the attention of Congress to the above plain recital of facts, and ask that a suitable appropriation may be made for the improvement of the estuary of San Antonio, the harbor of Oakland, in accordance with such plans as may be recommended or considered expedient by the board of engineers for the Pacific coast, and the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

MACK WEBBER,

Attest:
W. WILLEBRAND, City Clerk.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say—and I say it at this time that it may go in the RECORD—that I have been asked by several members whether I would recommend to the House a session for debate this evening, and I have invariably replied that I would ask for such a session, could I be assured there would be any one to speak. I have received no assurance of that kind, and therefore I do not feel at liberty to ask for such a session.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the proceedings and resolutions of the common council of the city of Brooklyn, New York, remonstrating against the disposition by the Government of portion of the lands lying in the Wallabout, in the city of Brooklyn. This paper pertains more especially to one of the Executive Departments of the Government, but I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the subject may go before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of the East Side, West Side, and North Side Associations of the city of New York in favor of increased appropriations for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate in the East River. This petition sets forth historically a very strong case, showing, among other things, the immense importance to the commerce of the whole country of a free channel at that point. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of L. Madison Day, praying reimbursement for property purchased by him from the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of the town of Alexandria, Louisiana, praying for the building of a breakwater in the Red River opposite the town of Alexandria in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAGER presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, asking for the abolition of the tariff duty on quicksilver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route from Reno, in the State of Nevada, to Quincy in California; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAGER. I present a memorial of the Legislature of California, reciting that heretofore lands have been granted for the construction of railroads on condition that they should be sold and disposed of within three years after the road was completed, and asking legislation on the subject requiring the companies to report the lands that they have disposed of according to their charters, and that as to those which may not have been sold, provision shall be made for their settlement and pre-emption as in other cases. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that soldiers in the late war who have lost a leg above the knee shall be entitled to the same increase of pension as is allowed by law to those who have lost an arm above the elbow; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a memorial of John Beeson, asking the appointment of a delegation, composed in part of women, to visit the Indian tribes and devise means to improve their condition; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHURZ. I present a concurrent resolution passed by the General Assembly of Missouri, instructing the Senators from that State and requesting the Representatives to support House bill No. 2342, which provides for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi according to the plan submitted by James B. Eads. I move the reference of the resolution to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Anna Ella Carroll be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Cameron, of Tennessee, praying compensation for property taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 647) to pay James and Emma S. Cameron for property taken and used by the Army during the late war.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I would remark that that claim is for damage done to property, destruction of timber lands, &c., and it is indorsed by the then General, now President, Grant as being just and equitable, and he says it ought to be paid. I state this in the light of what has occurred recently in debate here.

Mr. McCREERY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of certain settlers on the Sac and Fox diminished reserve, Osage County, Kansas, praying an extension of the time in which to make payments for their lands, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the suffering condition of certain Chippewa Indians in Wisconsin, reported a bill (S. No. 648) making an appropriation for the relief of Chippewa Indians attached to the Red Cliff and Bad River reservations, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Albert G. Clary, United States Navy, now on the active list, asking to be restored to his original position on the Navy Register next after Commodore C. R. P. Rodgers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

ROBERT M. AND STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas, to report the accompanying resolution referring the claim, so far as it refers to cotton, to the Court of Claims.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the petition and accompanying papers in the matter of the petition of Robert M. Douglas and Stephen A. Douglas, praying that they be paid for certain cotton and other property, in so far as the same relates to cotton, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, to be heard and determined according to law and the course of that court in such cases and proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that this relief should be granted by a bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. The act of Congress provides otherwise. The committee examined into that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 649) for the relief of L. Madison Day; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHURCH ON WHITE-EARTH RESERVATION.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have necessarily to be absent for a few days, and there is a bill on the Calendar which will probably be reached in my absence; but I would prefer, if the Senate would indulge me, to have it taken up now. It is House bill No. 1930.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land in the White-Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, on which are situated their church and other buildings, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the Mississippi bands of Chippewa Indians, to cause to be issued a patent to the Episcopal Board of Missions for eighty acres of land, to embrace the church, parsonage, and hospital, and such other buildings as may have been, or may, prior to the issue of the patent, be, erected, by and under the direction of the board, on the White-Earth Indian reservation in Minnesota; the land to be selected by the person acting under the authority of the board, and reported by the United States agent for the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, through the office of Indian Affairs, to the Secretary of the Interior; and there is a proviso that the estate conveyed to the board shall cease and be determined when the land and the erections thereon shall no longer be occupied and used by the board for missionary and school purposes.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am authorized to propose the following amendment: In line 6 I move to strike out the words "Episcopal Board of Missions," and insert "Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States;" that being the proper name of the society.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The word "board" will be found in the tenth line, and also in the twelfth, fifteenth, and seventeenth lines of the bill. In each of those lines I move that the word "board" be stricken out, and the word "society" substituted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those amendments will be made if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to secure to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States the land in the White-Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, on which are situated their church and other buildings."

SEMINOLE ANNUITIES.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment to lines 18 and 19, striking out the words "seven thousand five hundred" and inserting the words "five thousand;" and that the amendment of the Senate be agreed to.

WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM,
JOHN J. INGALLS,
T. C. McCREERY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN T. AVERILL,
A. COMINGO,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar will now be proceeded with, unless there be further morning business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MITCHELL to strike out, in line 6, "$3,976.19," and in lieu thereof to insert "$3,385.15."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the reading of the minority report.

Mr. SCOTT. I was about proceeding, when the morning hour expired yesterday, to speak briefly in answer to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] upon this bill; and I had proceeded so far as to state that the question involved in it was whether the Senate would now ignore the principles that have been adopted in legislation since 1839 denying to public officers extra pay or double pay when they discharged the duties for a short period of a different office from that to which they were appointed. I had further proceeded so far as to read the act of 1792, under which the present claimant held his appointment, and I will again read it for the purpose of making it applicable to the few remarks that I will make now. The act reads thus:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

I had further remarked that the person who drew that act of Congress evidently drew it with the intention of obviating a constitutional objection. That objection will appear by reference to the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which I will also read. It is:

He—

That is the President—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Now, I ask attention to the fact that the claim made here is for the performance of the duties of Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury, in each case the head of a Department, so that this officer is not one the appointment of whom Congress may by law vest in the President alone, in the courts, or in the heads of Departments. He is himself, if he is such an officer, the head of a Department, and if he be one of the officers to be nominated by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as he evidently is, then he could not have been Secretary of the Treasury or Secretary of State. Now, the claim made for him here, and the ground upon which that claim was decided in his favor in the Court of Claims, was that he was filling two offices. He could not fill two offices. He was simply the chief clerk of the State Department and the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, and as such under this act of 1792, treating it as constitutional, he was not appointed Secretary of State; he was not appointed Secretary of the Treasury, but he was by the President authorized "to perform the duties of the said respective offices until the absence" or inability from sickness should cease. He was not, therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of State, and it may be that at some time in the future, when such officers shall be performing these duties and shall do some act which they can only do by virtue of their authority as head of a Department, a very serious question may arise as to whether such a person has all the authorities of the head of a Department. But that does not arise here. The only question we have now before us is, whether Mr. Dickins, or his legatees he having deceased, shall be paid the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State during the time that he was performing the duties of those offices under the designation of the President.

These services were performed in 1829 and from that period up until 1836, so that the Senate will see that forty-five years have elapsed since the first of these services were performed and thirty-eight years since the last of them were performed—services performed at intervals covering sometimes a few days, sometimes twelve or thirteen—I believe the longest period was forty-eight days—some of them nine, some of them four, some of them three, some twenty-one, some thirty-two, &c.

From 1836 until the time of his death (I do not exactly remember the date of it, but it was probably in 1861) Mr. Dickins was the Secretary of this body, and had ample opportunity, if he had a just claim, of presenting it and having it most favorably considered; but thirteen years elapsed from the time the last of these services were performed in 1836 before he ever presented a petition to Congress claiming anything at all; and the idea that he was entitled to claim seems then to have been suggested by the fact that the chief clerk of the War Department presented a claim for services of a similar character and the accounting officers allowed it, supposing they had the authority to do so. He then for the first time presented his claim in 1849, and it has been in Congress with varying success from that time down to the present, sometimes passing the House, at other times defeated in the House, once or twice I believe passing the Senate and being defeated in the House, but never having obtained the sanction of both Houses of Congress so as to pass it into a law.

Now it comes before us in 1874, forty-five years, as I have stated, after the first services were rendered, and the question presented to the Senate is, will we encourage all the claims that may lie buried in those forty-five years for services of a similar character—services on the part of clerks or officers of a Department who may be detailed for a short time from the Bureau or desk which they occupy to perform the duties of a Bureau or desk of a different character? As I have already said, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to vote this amount to the legatees of Mr. Dickins from other motives, from motives of sympathy, from motives of respect for his memory, or anything of that character, let it be upon that ground; but, as the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I deem it my duty to stand here and as far as I can to hold the door shut against the flood of claims that will follow if the principles of our legislation be broken over by the passage of any act of this character.

Now let us look at it. He was the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, and in 1818 an act was passed reorganizing the various Executive Departments, and what was the language of that act? Let me read the section:

SEC. 9. That the compensation allowed by this act to clerks, shall commence from and after the 31st day of March last, and it shall be the duty of the Secretaries for the Departments of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, of the Commissioners of the Navy, and the Postmaster-General, to report to Congress at the beginning of each year the names of the clerks they have employed respectively in the preceding year, together with the time each clerk was actively employed during the year, and the sums paid to each; and no higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act.

Let it be borne in mind that Mr. Dickins was at these respective times the chief clerk of the Treasury and the State Departments. I have argued that he could hold no other office under this act of 1792. The act does not authorize the President to appoint him to another office, but authorizes him to detail such clerk for the time being to the discharge of the duties of another office. He was then the chief clerk of the Treasury Department; and the argument of the Senator from Oregon and of this minority report is that as such clerk he shall be paid no other salary. Very well, let it be so. What other office does he hold, then? That of chief clerk. The language is that while he holds that clerkship "no higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act," and I hold that that act under which he held his appointment in 1829 is a prohibition of an allowance for another office, any other compensation than that of the clerkship which he then held.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the date of that act?

Mr. SCOTT. The date of that act is 1818, an act in force at the time these services were rendered, and I do not wish the Senate to lose sight of that act. It is conceded that the act of 1839, the act of 1842, and subsequent acts expressly prohibited the payment of such a compensation as is here allowed; and if the acts of 1839 and 1842 had been on the statute-book at the time these services were rendered, no member of the minority of the committee who makes this report would contend that the payment of this claim is not absolutely and in terms prohibited by those acts of Congress. Now I hold——

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not as familiar with that act as the Senator from his service on the Committee on Claims has been, but my impression is that the construction of the act has repeatedly allowed similar payments to be made, one of them to Mr. Fletcher Webster.

Mr. SCOTT. The report cites the cases of Fletcher Webster and of Mr. Young, chief clerks of the State and Treasury Departments; and the peculiarity of this case is that if the construction was then placed upon this act which authorized these clerks to be paid for services thus rendered, the same construction ought to have been given at that time to the act in favor of Mr. Dickins if he made his claim. He was paid for one of the short periods during which he performed the duties of Secretary of State; and the peculiarity of the case is that notwithstanding he was paid that, and notwithstanding at a subsequent period some of the accounting officers did allow the claim of Mr. Young and Mr. Fletcher Webster, Mr. Dickins never thought of presenting a claim for these services until these subsequent constructions gave him the idea that he might be entitled to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. My impression was—the Senator can correct me if I am in error—that payments of this kind were made under the general law, or under its permission in the absence of any prohibition by law, and that many such cases were paid for without any specific appropriation by Congress. I think the reason why Mr. Dickins's claim was not preferred at the time is hardly an argument against it. Mr. Dickins was a reasonably prosperous man and a very modest man, and he did not prefer the claim until he felt the need of it. Certainly the Senator will not plead the statute of limitations against a servant of the Senate for twenty-five years.

Mr. SCOTT. I will come to that question of the statute of limitations in a moment. I was arguing that under the law as it stood when Mr. Dickins rendered these services, notwithstanding the construction of the Department in one or two isolated instances, payment was prohibited to any clerk in the Treasury or State Department of any other salary than that which was fixed by the law of 1818; I care not what it was. The language is explicit:

No higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act.

And the Departments embraced by that act are the State, Treasury, War, and Navy. Now, passing from that down to 1839, what were the acts of Congress?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims whether Mr. Dickins performed these services in the Treasury Department as clerk, or as acting Secretary? Did he perform those duties as a clerk? Were they a part of his duties as clerk?

Mr. SCOTT. I might answer that inquiry by putting another to the Senator, and asking whether, in the face of the constitutional provision that he must be nominated and confirmed by the Senate, he was Secretary of the Treasury, or Secretary of State?

Mr. MITCHELL. He was acting Secretary of State.

Mr. SCOTT. He was performing the duties of that office under the act, but he was still the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, detailed for the time being.

Mr. MITCHELL. In pursuance of an act of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. In pursuance of an act of Congress?

Mr. MITCHELL. The validity of which has never been questioned that I know of.

Mr. SCOTT. I am speaking of the status of the case as we now have it. If the validity of the act never was questioned, that does not show that a case may not arise in which it may not be questioned. I think it is very doubtful indeed whether, if the Secretary of War or the Secretary of State being absent, and an officer detailed in pursuance of this law of 1792 performed an act which could be performed only by him as Secretary of War or as Secretary of State, that act would have validity.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask another question: whether or not the President of the United States, under the eighth section of the act of May 8, 1792, did not have the power to appoint a person to act as Secretary of the Treasury who was not in any subordinate position in any Department?

Mr. SCOTT. I am very glad the Senator has put the question. The act of 1792 does authorize the President, as it is here quoted, to designate any person or persons at his discretion to perform the duties of the said respective offices. Now, under that act there has never been an instance in which some person in the public service has not been designated.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon——

Mr. SCOTT. I do not wish to be interrupted at this point. The Senator makes the point that the full statement in the report, that no person in the public service and in the public service in the same Department has not been detailed, is not correct. He has cited precedents which show that the full sentence is not correct, that persons in the public service in one Department have been detailed to perform duties in another, that the Attorney-General has been authorized to perform the duties of Secretary of War, or that the Secretary of War has been authorized to perform the duties of the Secretary of the Navy; but the statement still remains true that in no instance, so far as I can recall the cases, has the President ever gone entirely outside of official personages and called in——

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. I trust I shall be permitted to finish this sentence—— and called in one who was not holding any official position and required by his oath to discharge his official duties, to fill a position under this act of 1792. Now I will hear the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call the attention of the honorable chairman to a case directly in point. Going back to the year——

Mr. SCOTT. Before you call my attention to that case, let me follow out this argument.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator will allow me to answer this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I decline to yield until I answer one question at a time. On the supposition that the President could go outside (and then the Senator's precedent will have more effect if he can cite it) and call in an utter stranger, a man not in the public service at all, to fill an office of this character, I ask can you take him there and swear him in as Secretary of State or Secretary of War, while the commission of the former Secretary of State or Secretary of War is still in his possession? And if you cannot (and evidently you can not) have two Secretaries of State and two Secretaries of War, would the unauthorized act of that stranger, inducted into office without taking the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution, be a valid and lawful act performed by the Secretary of State or the Secretary of War? If the Senator has an instance in which a man not in official position at all has been detailed to perform the duties of a head of a Department, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very sorry that the chairman did not allow me to cite the instance when he made the assertion that no such instance existed in the history of the Government. I refer to the case of the appointment of James A. Hamilton as acting Secretary of State in 1829. In 1829 President Jackson appointed Martin Van Buren his Secretary of State. Before he arrived and took possession of the office, and while there was a vacancy in the office of Secretary of State, the President appointed James A. Hamilton, a citizen of the State of New York, a person not in the public service at all, to fill the position of Secretary of State until Mr. Van Buren should arrive. That appointment was made in pursuance of the eighth section of the act of May 8, 1792, and the National Intelligencer of March 6, 1829, makes this notice of the appointment:

James A. Hamilton, of New York, has been charged temporarily with the duties of Secretary of State.

There is an instance where a person not in the public service, not in any Department of the Government, was by the President appointed acting Secretary of State in pursuance of this very same identical statute under which this claim is made, and for which service he received his pay. Now, I submit that I have answered the position of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims on that point.

Mr. SCOTT. Instead of answering my position the Senator from Oregon has most effectually answered his own, because he states a case where Mr. Van Buren was appointed Secretary of State, but before he arrived and was sworn into office, before he was Secretary of State, another man was designated to discharge the duties; so that Mr. Van Buren was not, within the meaning of the act of 1792, "that in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the Secretary of State," &c., because Mr. Van Buren was not yet the Secretary of State, and had not been inducted into office. He was no more the Secretary of State than any other private individual was until he was sworn into office; and therefore, instead of answering the question which I put, the Senator has answered his own position, and shown that this was an appointment, if it was claimed to be, under the act of 1792, not coming within its terms at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will find on a reference to the book of expenditures that he was paid for those services in pursuance of an appointment under the act of 1792. It appears that the Government officers treated this as an appointment under that act at that time, and paid him accordingly.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly, if the Senate was not in session at that time and the President appointed him Secretary of State to go in there and perform the duties, the office being vacant, Mr. Hamilton was Secretary of State and would be paid as a matter of course. That does not answer the question at all.

Now, let me proceed with these acts of 1839, 1842, and 1850; and, first, I will read the act of 1839:

That no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary or whose pay or emoluments is or are fixed by law and regulations, shall receive any extra allowance or compensation in any form whatever for the disbursement of public money or the performance of any other service, unless the said extra allowance or compensation be authorized by law.

The act of 1842:

That no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments is or are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation in any form whatever for the disbursement of public money or for any other service or duty whatsoever, unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation.

The act of 1850:

That hereafter the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, or other pay officers of the United States, shall in no case allow and pay to one individual the salaries of two different officers on account of having performed the duties thereof at the same time. But this prohibition shall not extend to the superintendents of the executive buildings.

It is argued that these acts, being of a date subsequent to the rendition of these services by Mr. Dickins, simply recognize that in the absence of these acts his claim would have been allowed. So far from that, the very existence of claims of this character was a reason for passing these acts, and was the evidence of the policy of the Government that such claims ought not to be allowed. That was the policy that was established by these acts.

And now, having said this much upon them, I wish it distinctly understood that I am here not so much opposing the claim of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, not for anything that is peculiar to that case, but I am here as the organ of the Committee on Claims for the purpose of asserting the principle embodied in the acts, and of saying to the Senate that this door ought not to be opened; for if it is opened there is no kind of arithmetic that will compute the number of claims of this character which will come upon us. At this session I had occasion to report upon a claim for extra compensation based absolutely in large part upon the ground that the man ought to be paid a larger salary than was fixed by law because his superior officer had compelled him to discharge his duties in a room the temperature of which was kept above a healthy degree of the thermometer. This is one of a class of cases. The law fixes the salary of every office. The man who goes into the employment of the Government understands what that salary is. If he does not like it, he ought to give up the place and take up some other employment; but if he remains in it and discharges the duties that are imposed upon him by law, let him take that salary, and let Congress rid itself of the importunity that will forever follow it if claims for extra compensation or double pay are encouraged by allowing any of them.

Now, Mr. President, if with this statement of the views of public policy which prompted the Committee on Claims to report this claim adversely the Senate see proper to overrule it, upon them be the responsibility; our duty will have been discharged.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I do not suppose that it is possible that Congress can be rid of claims, especially of those claims where the interested parties reside in this District. The time will never come when some kind-hearted committee, or some still more kind-hearted minority, will not be found to report in favor of these old, stale claims.

What are the facts in relation to this case? The parties in interest, I admit, are entitled to the respect, possibly to the affection, of Senators; but has not the party in whose name this claim is now presented been treated with uncommon generosity by the Government of the country? For over thirty years, almost a life-time, he was in the employment of the Government and in the receipt of his full and regular salary.

There never was any solid foundation for this claim. If there is a solid foundation for a claim like this, there is scarcely a clerk in all the Departments who has been promoted to discharge the duties of a second to a third or a fourth class clerkship that might not as legitimately come before us for an increase of pay as for this party to come here and ask for pay in consequence of the discharge of the duties of his superior officer. Why, Mr. President, can you come before the Senate and put in a claim for the pay of the Vice-President, although you are discharging his duties, and discharging them very efficiently? The office of Secretary of State was filled at the time by a party who was occasionally absent; but the United States paid the full salary of the Secretary of State and of the Secretary of the Treasury. Are we to pay two salaries?

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend from Vermont allow me to correct him in one particular?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I do not understand that this bill proposes to compensate the heirs or legatees of Asbury Dickins for services performed by him in the double capacity of chief clerk and acting Secretary of the Treasury at the same time. Of course while he was performing the duties of acting Secretary his functions as chief clerk for the time being were suspended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No; but it does propose to pay two salaries of Secretary of State or two salaries of Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not two salaries; the difference between the two.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Suppose that our Secretary of the Senate should be taken ill and be absent for a week or a month, and his duties should be discharged, as they would be faithfully discharged, by the clerk who sits nearest to him on the left; all the difference that it would make to that clerk would be perhaps that he would be a head taller; he would feel a little honored from discharging the duties of his superior in the office of Secretary.

Now, Mr. President, all I have to say in relation to this matter is, that if this claim should pass, it will pass simply because there have been one or two or three bad precedents. We are called upon here to legislate to overturn the whole policy and existing laws from the foundation of the Government, simply because some kind-hearted committee have reported in favor of a bad case; and if this bill shall pass it will furnish a precedent for ever so many more. It will not only take out of the Treasury three or four thousand dollars, but very possibly several hundred thousand dollars.

This claim comes in here, after sleeping a long series of years, for service when the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury happened to be absent, in 1831, for nine days, in 1833 for four days, and in 1833 again for three days, and so running through a long number of years. We understand perfectly that it has been the habit of the Secretaries as well as of the clerks of the different Departments to have an absence during the warm weather of a month almost every year, and the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and of State, whenever their superiors in office are absent, of course discharge their duties. They feel it not only not an additional burden, as it is not, but instead an additional honor to be called to discharge the higher duties of their superiors. If this bill should pass it will furnish a precedent for the chief clerk of the State Department, Mr. Hunter. He has been in office for many, many years. If this bill passes I have no doubt he might come in for and claim much more than a year's salary of the Secretary of State.

Mr. PRATT. There is a statute that prevents that now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There has been a statute always against it. The last statute we passed was only the judgment of Congress that these were claims of a character which never ought to have passed and never should hereafter. It was to prevent my kind-hearted friend from Indiana from being importuned by these claimants, and I am sorry that he has not profited by the judgment of Congress, and has been overcome by them at the present time.

Then there was Mr. Harrington, a very intelligent Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. We all know that he discharged the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury time and again, week after week. Then there was Mr. Chandler, who discharged the duties also at various times; also Mr. Richardson; and I could name a large number that have performed similar services who might and who would be likely to present an unending series of claims of exactly the same character.

Mr. President, I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do, but ask the Senator to renew it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will allow the Senator to renew it. I am very much astonished, Mr. President, at the opposition which is made to this bill, which is in the line of exact and numerous precedents. It has passed the Senate two or three times; it has passed the House of Representatives two or three times; and it has been adjudicated upon favorably by the Court of Claims, to which it was remitted by Congress. This claim was presented to us many years ago, and we, not having time to examine into it, referred it to a judicial tribunal. It was not brought there by the claimant; it was referred there by us. That tribunal pronounced in favor of the claim. The House of Representatives passed the bill, but it failed in the Senate; and again the Senate has passed the bill and it has failed in the other House.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator permit me to correct him in regard to the reference to the Court of Claims? Originally, as the Court of Claims was constituted, it could not enter a judgment for the claimant. It was referred by the House of Representatives to the Court of Claims. The court found in favor of it, and when that report was made to the House of Representatives their committee upon that case made an adverse report and recommended that it should not be paid.

Mr. ANTHONY. But subsequently I think they passed the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Subsequently it passed the House, but not at that session.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thank the Senator for correcting me, because it reminds me that if the Court of Claims had then, when this claim was referred to it, the jurisdiction which it has now, it would have been paid and would not have come to Congress; and since the House of Representatives reported adversely upon the judgment of the Court of Claims the House itself has passed the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Another House?

Mr. ANTHONY. Another House. I suppose there are very few Senators here who recollect Mr. Dickins. I remember when I first came into this body, more than fifteen years ago, there sat at the desk below your chair, sir, a man who had grown gray in that seat. He was a man of venerable appearance, of dignified manners, courteous to everybody, the new Senators and the old Senators, the minority and the majority. He was prompt and efficient in the discharge of his duties and wholly conscientious in everything. That man was Asbury Dickins, the third Secretary of this body. He served for twenty-five years, and in all that time he never was charged with any malfeasance or misfeasance in office, he never was charged with the omission or with the imperfect performance of any duty. In the course of his service he was the friend of some of the most illustrious men who have adorned this Chamber; he was the friend of Webster, of Clay, of Calhoun, of Benton, of Frelinghuysen, of Southard, of Everett, of John Davis, and of many others, their coevals and successors. He died in the service of the Senate, and he died poor. He left to his family nothing but his good name, and the memory of modest, unobtrusive, but very important services. His principal legatees, I believe his sole legatees, are two daughters, maiden ladies, who were brought up in all the luxuries and all the refinements of the most cultivated society in Washington, and who were left by their father's death almost entirely destitute.

When I first knew Mr. Dickins, age had laid its hand upon him, tenderly, it is true, but perceptibly, and had somewhat impaired his original vigor, but he was still a man of great intelligence, of great ability, and of large information. Before he came into the Senate he had rendered excellent service in two of the Executive Departments.

Mr. Dickins wrote one of the most remarkable papers in the history of our politics; he was the author of the defense of William H. Crawford, when as Secretary of State he was charged with malfeasance in office and threatened with impeachment, at a time when he was a candidate for President of the United States. This was in the celebrated "A. B. Conspiracy," which is almost forgotten now, but is familiar to the students of American history. That defense gained great credit for Mr. Crawford, but with his characteristic candor he stated that it was written, not by him, but by a clerk in his Department, Mr. Dickins. Mr. Randolph, who, with Mr. Webster, was on the committee of the House of Representatives to which the matter was referred, pronounced it "a triumphant and irresistible vindication," and praised its temper and spirit as well as its argument.

All that, it is true, does not give Mr. Dickins any claim on the Treasury. We are not to take money out of the Treasury for sympathy or for charity, but for justice. But I submit that it ought to make us look kindly upon the claimant, and not make it the first example of a harsh interpretation of the law. I submit that we should give to Mr. Dickins what we gave to Mr. Fletcher Webster, what we gave to Mr. Young, what we have given repeatedly to others, what the Court of Claims, the tribunal to which we referred the matter, said belonged to him, and what the House of Representatives send over to us. Shall we refuse to the legatees of our old and faithful servant; shall we in that case alone refuse what the judicial tribunals say he ought to have, and what the other House of Congress proffer to us?

Mr. President, the Court of Claims must be presumed to know the law; and when we refer a case to the Court of Claims and they adjudicate it, I think we ought to accept their decision. I hope that Mr. Dickins will not be made the first example of this new and rigid interpretation of the law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think that the tribute which has been paid by the Senator from Rhode Island to this party is worth a good deal; but I hardly think we can afford to make an appropriation of four or five hundred thousand dollars for the sake of making this gift to his heirs.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not involve four or five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I renew my motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to say a word or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is not debatable.

Mr. MERRIMON. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There is not time now.

Mr. MERRIMON. The morning hour is just expiring, and I trust the bill will pass over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2213) granting a pension to Mrs. Cynthia McPherson, mother of the late General James B. McPherson; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to enable me now to submit a motion that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the bill just received, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. CONKLING. No; I object to that. I want to know what the House amendment is. It is a pretty important matter, and we ought to understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the matter cannot now be acted upon.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] as modified at the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] to strike out the third section of the bill and insert other words in lieu thereof.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the motion now pending amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the substitute offered by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which was accepted by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] It now stands on the record as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, as amended, and it is now subject to amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out "Maine" and insert "Pennsylvania," and on that I am entitled to ten minutes, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I find by calculation that, taking Maine as the basis, this section will give in round numbers $280,000,000 additional national-bank circulation; taking New York as the basis, it will give $124,000,000. That would make the total national-bank circulation on the basis of Maine $634,000,000. On that basis Ohio would have $19,000,000 in addition to what she has now; Indiana, $11,000,000; Illinois, $22,000,000; Virginia, $8,500,000; West Virginia, $2,700,000; North Carolina, $8,000,000; Georgia, $8,300,000; New York, $41,000,000 more than she has at present; Pennsylvania, $24,000,000 more. This is on the basis of Maine, making a total of $280,000,000 in all the States more than is now authorized by law. I give round numbers.

But taking the basis of New York as in the original third section as it came from the committee, would make $124,000,000 in addition to the present national-bank circulation, making the whole volume of national-bank circulation $478,000,000.

If my proposition to strike out "Maine" and insert "Pennsylvania" be adopted, it would give to some of the prominent States something like this in round numbers; to New York nearly $1,000,000 more than she has at present; to Ohio $4,300,000 more; to Indiana $2,300,000 more; to Illinois $9,000,000 more; to Virginia $5,600,000 more; to West Virginia $1,300,000; to North Carolina $6,000,000; to Georgia $6,000,000. This is in addition to what they have under the existing law. The total increase, taking Pennsylvania as the basis, will be $110,000,000 beyond the present amount of national-bank circulation.

Mr. CONKLING. Nearly $111,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. One hundred and ten million eight hundred thousand dollars, to be exact. I have left out the fractions and given round numbers.

Mr. GORDON. I should hope that by accepting the amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia we could get an immediate vote on this question. I vastly prefer Maine, myself, as the basis; but if the Senator from West Virginia and those around him, two or three of whom have voted against us hitherto, are ready for a compromise on the basis of Pennsylvania, I think the friends who have advocated free banking, or banking upon the basis of Maine, can afford to accept it as a compromise, and in the spirit of compromise I do accept it. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia, and trust we shall be able to get an immediate vote on that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia accepts the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I may say that the amendment itself is an extraordinary one, but there are a good many extraordinary things in this debate. The only difference—I have compared the two—between the proposition of the Senator from Georgia and the third section of the bill reported by the committee is the word "Maine" instead of the word "New York;" and yet to obscure the matter, or for some other purpose, it is deemed necessary to recite the whole section over again; but the gist of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia is to insert "Maine" instead of "New York," as the standard of increased bank circulation.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I am perfectly willing that the motion made by myself shall stand simply as a motion to adopt the third section of the committee's bill as amended by the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what it is. I always try to get at the gist of a matter, and am not particular about forms or words. I did not know any reason for cumbering our legislative records with a restatement of the third section over and over again, especially when the short road was to strike out the word "New York" and insert the word "Maine."

Mr. GORDON. Let me explain, if the Senator pleases, in order to make my own record correct. I appreciate what the Senator says in that direction; but when this third section was arranged by myself as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, there were other clauses inserted, but after consultation upon the floor, and agreement between us as to the programme, I struck out the other feature that I intended to offer with that, which was the interchangeability of bonds; and therefore the amendment went in the shape in which it did to the desk.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have, in order to get at the precise result of these various amendments, endeavored to make a careful analysis of them, and I will give it to the Senate. Upon the basis of New York the increase of bank circulation would possibly be from one hundred to one hundred and ten millions. My friend from West Virginia states that the Comptroller makes it more; but it amounts to from one hundred to one hundred and ten millions. I do not think it more than that. Upon the basis of Pennsylvania it would allow an increase, I think, of more than one hundred and ten millions, although I am told by my friend that one hundred and eleven millions is the statement of the Comptroller; and as it is rather a compound question of arithmetic, depending upon two different bases of distribution, perhaps the Comptroller is more accurate than I am. On the basis of Maine the increase provided for is $263,156,000; and to test this computation any Senator can very easily turn to the table on page 71 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency and he will find that the increase proposed on the basis of the State of New York would be first to supply the deficiency in all the States, which amounts to $82,000,000, and then to add about 5 per cent. to the amount assigned to all the States. On the basis of Pennsylvania you would have to add about 10 per cent., and that of Maine would require an addition of 61 4/10 per cent. Thus the actual increase authorized by the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Georgia would be $263,156,000. As a matter of course, I wish to take the lowest sum that possibly can be obtained; and then, as the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina proposes to confine this increase to $46,000,000, I shall vote against the whole bill and for the substitute proposed by the Senator from North Carolina in case no other provision is added. I wish to make my own course clear, because in legislation I take always the least of evils.

Mr. President, I now again call on the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who has taken the lead in striking out all the provisions of this bill that look toward maintaining the value of the legal-tender notes, I ask him now before this vote is taken, to tell us what provisions he intends to move to insert in this bill in order to save the greenbacks and the national-bank notes from depreciation. I have no fear of free banking or of taking New York or Pennsylvania as the standard of banking, provided we have some plan of redemption, provided we do not increase the amount of legal-tender notes without any promise whatever for their redemption and increase also the bank-notes without any promise whatever or any facility for their exchange or redemption. Therefore my vote hereafter will depend entirely upon the proposition which shall be moved by those who seem to have a majority here to maintain the value of the legal-tender notes. If some proper provision can be offered which will tend to maintain the value of legal-tender notes and prevent their daily depreciation, I should be perfectly willing to see banking to any extent; so that the question of the amount or standard of the banking circulation is a matter of subordinate and secondary consideration to some proposition for redemption.

If the Senator from Indiana says that he does not propose any mode of redemption, that his motions to strike out the second and fourth sections are not to be followed by some other provision seeking to maintain the value of the legal-tenders, then, as a matter of course, those of us who are opposed to this increase of paper money will take the very smallest limit of it in any way that is presented; but if there are measures proposed that meet our judgment which will maintain the purchasable power of the greenbacks with our view of the effects of paper money, we do not care how much paper money is used provided the tendency of the bill on the whole will be to appreciate nearer and nearer to the standard of gold the paper money of the country.

And, sir, if a party obligation could ever be thrust into a great discussion of this kind, let me beseech those who have stricken out all these features to remember that the first act of the Administration now in power was a promise to pay the notes in coin at the earliest day practicable; and now the last act that is pending here before us is to strike out every provision that looks that way, that has a bearing or tendency that way, and to increase the amount of the legal-tender notes without redemption and to increase by more than $100,000,000 the amount of bank-notes, taking the least of these propositions. Sir, when that pledge was made the limit of bank-notes was $300,000,000; the legal limit of legal-tenders was $356,000,000. You have increased the one $44,000,000, and you have increased the other $54,000,000; and now the least of all the propositions that are before us for increasing bank-notes is $46,000,000 more.

Therefore I appeal to Senators to give us notice now and let us see what they propose to insert in place of these sections stricken out, and at any rate to give us notice whether they intend to put out these greenbacks and these bank-notes without any promise, provision, or hope for redemption, or as to the time when, the place where, or the mode and manner. I should like to see that question settled before we vote on these different standards. Until then, as a matter of course, with my convictions I shall vote for that standard which will issue the least amount of this form of paper money without redemption.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it has been the subject of complaint with many religious people in this country for a good many years that when our fathers formed the Constitution they did not put into it a recognition of Almighty God; but it seems, according to the argument of several Senators, that they put gold into it, which many think is better; they erected in the Constitution a golden shrine, at which many persons worship who worship at no other.

Now, Mr. President, this debate has been going on for nearly four months, and no human being in the Senate or out of it has been able to tell the country how we can get the gold in one, two, three, four, or five years with which to resume specie payments and maintain that resumption. In view of that fact, I think it is time to cease darkening counsel by talking about specie resumption.

Now, to come to the next point made by the Senator, he wants to know, if we are to increase the legal-tender notes $18,000,000 more, what we are willing to do in the way of conversion to maintain the character of these legal-tender notes. Mr. President, it is not necessary to do anything beyond what the nation has already done. The issue of $18,000,000 more, or of $80,000,000 more, will not depreciate them one cent. This nation stands behind them. "Ah!" the Senator from Ohio says, "what a monstrous proposition." The Senator told us the day before yesterday that the issue of $26,000,000 by the Secretary of the Treasury had sent up the price of gold, and when I sent and made the inquiry I found that gold was nearly 4 per cent. higher just that day one year ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave the official statement, if my friend will allow me, that on the very day the first dollar of the $26,000,000 was issued, when we reached the legal limit of $356,000,000, gold was worth 109; to-day it is worth 113½.

Mr. MORTON. Who denies that? That is begging the question. Gold had gone down under the influence of the panic when nobody wanted gold and everybody wanted greenbacks. That is all there is of that. The argument only goes to show that in times of pressure and public necessity greenbacks are more desirable than gold. The argument is the other way. I showed that the average price of gold during the spring of 1873, when we had not the $26,000,000 out, was some 4 or 5 per cent. higher than it is now.

Mr. President, you cannot bring about specie payments by simply contracting the greenbacks down to $300,000,000, and you will not depreciate their value by putting them up to $400,000,000. The people of this country have some sense. They want enough money, but do not want any more. They want enough to do the business of the country; but because they want enough to do that they are told they will get drunk, they will become gluttons, they will want $2,000,000,000! The very argument is an impeachment of the intelligence of Congress and of the people of the United States. They know that population has increased; they know that the country has been developed; they know that business has been vastly increased, and that more currency is demanded, and because they ask an increase just adequate to this increase of demand we are met with the cry of "inflation," "irredeemable paper," "the country is to be ruined," and somebody is to be scared!

Why, sir, only yesterday I saw in a very prominent New York paper that inflation is war. Have you seen it, sir? In a solemn editorial we are told that inflation is war, and that the Atlantic States will take up arms to prevent this proposed increase of the currency. There is to be a grand army of contraction brought into the field—I had better call it an army looking out for contracts. We are told that this measure will be resisted by force of arms. I need not argue whether there is anything in this threat; but it is quite as reasonable and as proper as much that has been said here in the Senate. Because the people want a little more currency to meet the wants of business and want free banking, we are told that we will depreciate the greenbacks!

Mr. President, we will come to specie payments when we can. There is no use of talking about it now. You have not the gold and you cannot get it in one, two, three, or four years, and no Senators upon this floor, however able they may be, have been able to tell us where the gold can come from. We might as well quit talking about that for the time being. The people want a little more currency. They believe it will be good for them, and I believe it. I believe it will revive business all over this nation. I believe that business will spring up under the influence of a promise like that, just as the grass and the flowers will grow under the spring showers. They require that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, during the four months' discussion upon this subject I believe I have not spoken to exceed ten minutes. I have trusted that we might come to some conclusion upon it, and would not delay that by talking. But, sir, it seems to me it is time that an energetic protest should be made against the assumption which we heard upon the floor of the Senate yesterday, and perhaps the tone which pervades the debate to-day, that there is a majority in this Chamber which is responsible for the action here, not divided by party lines, relieving those who are assumed to be in the minority of responsibility in this matter, and even objecting to the offering of amendments by those who are not so happy as to be classed in the majority.

Mr. MORTON. I said nothing about majorities in my few remarks.

Mr. SARGENT. I was not referring exactly to what the Senator said, but rather to the tone of the debate. But in order to show just what I do mean I desire to call attention to the remarks, more pointed in this respect, of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] yesterday. He told us that there was a majority here who had taken charge of these measures, that this majority assumed to shape them, and looked with some ungraciousness toward attempts to amend the bill by the minority.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I know the Senator from California does not wish to misrepresent me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SARGENT. I do for a moment. I have only ten minutes.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I trust the Senator from California in his allusion to my remarks of yesterday will observe that they were made in connection with the speech made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in which he stated that the responsibility was being rolled upon the majority. I spoke in reply to that, in connection with the gravity of the question and the willingness of the majority, if it was forced upon them, to assume that responsibility.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, there are several responsibilities weighing upon legislators. In the first place, there is the responsibility which necessarily arises from the position of a Senator, no matter to what party he may belong. There is another and additional responsibility which belongs to the member of the dominant party. Gentlemen may shirk this responsibility as much as they please; but before the people the dominant party is held responsible for whatever measures pass this body. That responsibility we cannot escape. That responsibility weighs upon us, upon the Senator himself, and upon myself equally with him for that reason, as well as upon Senators generally. In order not to do the Senator injustice I quote his remarks. He said:

> I have no disposition to take up time in debate any more than to call attention to this sudden change of policy and to the pertinacious determination of those who are now in the minority to defeat the measures of the majority. They have volunteered the statement that they are trying to perfect the bill, and as resolutely state that they intend rolling the responsibility of results upon the majority. I say, in calmness and fairness and good faith, if we are charged with the duty of framing measures of relief and stability and are to sustain the responsibility of what is done, let it then be managed by its friends.

Again he said:

> But when it is attempted now to break down the national-bank currency to a lower standard of value, I cannot understand the gentleman, and I must say it seems more like an intention to thwart the majority in their efforts to perfect what is charged they must necessarily assume. I am prepared, so far as my vote and action are concerned, to take my part of the responsibility of this question.

I deny that that peculiar responsibility rests upon any gentlemen in this Chamber except within the limitations that I have mentioned. But if there is a majority in this Chamber on this subject, how is it made up at the present time? It is partly made up by gentlemen pairing with notable industry every Senator on their side of the question who is away from the Chamber; but principally because Massachusetts is unrepresented on this floor. One Senator from Massachusetts is dead, and the Legislature of that State, although its interests are so deeply involved—the men of all parties there having a concurrence of opinion on this subject—is caviling over the question who shall come back to represent it, while this the greatest question affecting Massachusetts interests that can come before this Congress is being decided. The other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is sick and unpaired; and on the test question yesterday of striking out the fourth section it was only carried by two. The vote was 29 to 27.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two Senators were present who had they been at liberty to vote, except for the pair, would have defeated it.

Mr. GORDON. One or two friends of the measure were temporarily out of the Chamber at the time.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; the majority at any rate is so small that it is very little to brag of. Now, it was proposed yesterday that we should sit this question out last night. I ask these gentlemen if with the slight margin of majority they have got they have the power to keep this Senate here for a night session? They know they cannot do it, and must depend on the "minority" for favors. I am disposed to come here, as I have done every day for four months, during the ordinary sessions of the Senate and listen to these debates, and if the majority are in favor of inflation then to take the chances of war; but I am not disposed to resort to extraordinary means in order that these measures which I think inimical to the country shall be carried out. Try your boasted majority and see how long you can hold the Senate to an extraordinary session, while so nearly one-half of us think every vote taken is a step toward national suicide.

The Senator from Georgia tells us that he proposes an amendment increasing the national-bank currency $110,800,000 as "a measure of compromise," and that in connection with a bill which increases the greenbacks $56,000,000 more. It is a measure, in my judgment, fraught with destruction to the country. I will not compromise upon any such idea as that, and I do not wish the Senator to offer the amendment under the idea that I or those who think with me will accept that as a compromise. Why, sir, it is proposed now, in a time of profound peace, when the country is ordinarily prosperous, when there is no great overwhelming danger, to resort to those expedients which nations only use at the very crisis of their fate, when destiny seems to bear down upon them, when there is danger of disintegration by violent insurrection or annihilation by foreign war. We resort to those measures which are condemned by the experience of all mankind and by our own in the recent rebellion. We resort to them now when heretofore the only justification for them has been that the evils which they bring in their train are only a little less than those which result from national disintegration; and we are to adopt this as our ordinary financial expedient.

What will be the effect of it? The first effect will be necessarily to bear heavily upon all who have fixed incomes. It reduces measurably the pensions of all your soldiers; it reduces the compensation of every one in the service of the Government. It is unjust to the creditor class; and have we a right to inflict that injustice upon them? I can see no warrant for it. Our appropriations this year have been cut down some eight to ten million dollars in the few bills that we have passed, to the very limit of economy based upon the present value of money; but if you increase the volume, you decrease its purchasing power, and the result will be large deficiency bills. Our taxes now are too light to answer the wants of the Government, provided you are going to expand the currency, because the Government not merely pays salaries and pensions which are fixed, and the taxes therefore would pay those, but it is compelled to buy materials of all kinds, to keep the Army in the field and the Navy afloat and carry on all the operations of the Government aside from paying salaries or fixed amounts. But, sir, your taxes, which now barely tide your Treasury over the current fiscal year, with this inflation will become inadequate, because the Government cannot carry out its purposes.

There is another consideration. Gentlemen here complain because Rhode Island, or Ohio, or Maine, or New York say that "our local interests are opposed to an inflation of the currency," and they look upon it as an unreasonable opposition. Sir, I believe this debate is forcing upon the attention of the country, and especially those who want a sound currency, the idea that we cannot trust to Congress to give us a national system. Under the State-bank system the State of Massachusetts or of Ohio could maintain its sound basis of specie, and while they might have "wild-cat" in Indiana, or Florida, or Louisiana—floods of irredeemable paper—and enjoy it there, yet whatever evils it might bring with it could not pass the boundary lines of those States, because it was kept out by the laws of trade and by the local laws; but here we are tied together by this system like the Siamese twins, so that whatever injures one city or one State injures the whole, and New York and Massachusetts are entirely powerless to protect themselves from the effect of a depreciation which is brought about in Indiana.

Seeing these evils, seeing that Congress is too fickle, that we cannot rely upon it to maintain that stability necessary for all finance, I am disposed to vote against the whole banking system; and gentlemen cannot say that I am an "extortionist" or in favor of a "banking monopoly," for I would sweep it all away from the earth and remit the States to their original rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MORTON. We understand the Senator now.

Mr. SARGENT. I want State banks unless we can have permanency.

Mr. MORTON. California has enjoyed that all the time.

Mr. SARGENT. I am legislating for the whole country.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I trust I shall not be considered as wanting in the courtesy due to my brother Senators, or lacking in appreciation of their ability or of their motives, when I state that I am unable to command language adequately to measure what I humbly conceive to be the enormity of the legislative blunders we are invited to commit. I am surprised not only at some of the propositions submitted by the opponents of free banking, but at the inconsistency of the arguments with which they attempt to maintain their opposition to free banking.

We are told by one that if we transfer $25,000,000 from the East to the West and South, these sections are so impoverished that they could not take it up for years. In the next breath we are told that if we allow these sections the privilege given to Maine or to Pennsylvania, so rapidly will they take up this banking capital that the country will be speedily flooded with paper money. What else? We are told by no less a personage than the chairman of the Finance Committee that the adoption of free banking is the death-knell of the national banks, and immediately thereafter by his colleague that the same measure is to perpetuate forever the system of national banks in this country. Sir, at one time free banking is to kill, at another time it is to make alive. At one time the South and West are too poor to take $25,000,000, at another time they will take enough national-bank currency to ruin the country. Sir, when doctors thus disagree, we may at least be temperate in the apprehensions we are invited to indulge as to the imminency of the evils with which they threaten us.

They offer us free banking, but upon what conditions? Not upon the condition that we redeem in gold, which they admit is impossible, but upon conditions infinitely more oppressive than redemption in gold. Feeling, as I claim to feel, a just amount of the responsibility resting upon a Senator to protect not only the credit of the Government, but also the interests of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent, I announce that I would prefer to vote for redemption in gold to voting for redemption in the bonds suggested by the Finance Committee. It will be less of a burden upon the people; less tax upon the industries of the country. The proposition is nothing less than the issue of some hundreds of millions of 5 per cent. gold-bearing bonds, and for what? What is the excuse? The honor of the nation. Sir, no Senator on this floor, whatever may have been his past record, from whatever section he may come, is further removed from submitting or advocating a proposition which would impair the credit of the Government than myself. Senators I think are unduly sensitive about the honor of the Government. If these United States notes were Government obligations, in which the citizens had invested from which to realize an income, I should be for their payment at almost any cost. But has any one so invested? Not at all. Has any citizen been deceived into accepting this obligation of the Government upon the expectation of such a payment? Not at all. When paid out by the Treasury and accepted by the party who received it, was any deceived by this promise? Not at all.

But let us analyze this question a little more in detail. What is this contract? I hold in my hand one of these obligations which

Senators propose to redeem by heavily taxing the industries of this country:

The United States will pay to bearer one dollar.

When? Is there any time fixed? None whatever. If my friend, the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] who has been so eloquent and so zealous in his advocacy of these harsh and cruel measures, as I must be allowed to term them, had made a contract with me one year previous to this date to pay me to-day in gold an amount of money, and had given me therefor his paper obligation, and I had gone to him on this day, when that gold was due, and said to him, "I neither demand the gold nor want the gold, but prefer that the obligation should rest just as it is," I ask Senators if the honor of the Senator from Maryland would compel him, or if he in law or in conscience is bound to force the gold upon me to protect his honor? Will any Senator maintain such a proposition?

And yet for a much stronger reason I hold that the Government is not bound to provide now for the redemption of this bill. Why? What is the nature of this Government and the nature of this contract? This Government, we must never forget, is an agent; the agent of the people, or I should have said, the agent of the States; and this obligation was made by this agent under the direction of the principal, which is the States or the people. It is a contract of the agent with the principal. It is a contract of the people with themselves. Are the States here—the principal—demanding its payment? Not one. Are the people demanding it? Nay, sir, I venture the assertion that if the simple question were submitted to the people whether they would thus tax their labor, to redeem this promise made to themselves, from all the producing sections, and I believe from every section, that an overwhelming and almost unanimous response would be made in the negative. I have no question about that.

So much, then, for the honor of the Government. But Senators remind us that it is bound by an act of Congress. The same argument applies in that case. The Congress is but the agent, and the agent has made this promise to the people, and the people do not desire its fulfillment. On the contrary they protest most emphatically against it, at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I merely wish to say a word in answer to my distinguished friend from Georgia on the point which he has made. He presents to us a promissory note, as I understand it to be. Now, I submit a proposition upon it and see how he can reconcile the one with the other. He is a lawyer of fine ability. I present to him simply three letters: I. O. U. Take the one-dollar bill that he has held up here in the Senate, and what is the legal effect of it? "I owe you one dollar," or if a thousand-dollar bill, "I owe you a thousand dollars." There is no date as to when that is to be paid, and therefore it is due. The dollar he exhibits here is due. Where is the good faith of the nation when it is presented and the response is, "O, this is not due; it does not say that it is to be paid at any given period?" That will not do for Senators. It might do for boys playing marbles, perhaps, where they are quarreling as to whether they would step over the line, or something of that kind; but surely, with Senators, with all the logic of my distinguished friend, it has no great force. The faith of the nation is solemnly pledged by the law that is found in your statutes, based upon the idea that that money is to be paid; and when a proposition is submitted here to give confidence to the citizens of this great nation and to the moneyed world, if we are not able to redeem the money as we sacredly promised by law, we should be very willing to pay interest upon the money. This country is not insolvent. Who is there who will pretend, after hearing all the arguments that we have had first and last, pro and con, on this subject, that the Government is not able to redeem its pledge? If it is able to do so, it is inexcusable in every sense of the word for not doing so. The money is due. Will it pay the money, or pay interest upon it if it can make an agreement upon that point which is satisfactory, as it appears it would be to one side here, and I have no doubt it would be and give confidence everywhere. The idea that there is no time fixed for payment will go for what it is worth. To me it is idle.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have long admired the ability of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] as we all have, and have always, if not exactly with admiration, at least with something akin to amazement, seen that singular audacity of his that makes nothing that he has ever said before stand in the way of what he wants to say to-day. I have heard once, since the weather-signal service was inaugurated, a gentleman say of a certain politician who was remarkable for the changes of his political course that he seemed to have a political "Old Probabilities" who foretold for him the political atmosphere for the next twenty-four hours, and he cut his garb and wore his clothes according to that prognostication. [Laughter.] I would not say that of the Senator from Indiana, but I must say that, looking at what he has said and hearing what he does say, I cannot but feel filled with astonishment.

My colleague put the question to him a short time ago, this morning, what would he do in view of that inflation which he advocates so earnestly—and of the inflationists he is the recognized leader—what would he do to prevent this paper money which he proposes to issue from becoming depreciated, and what answer does he make to that question? He treats it with derision, as a thing utterly absurd, because, says he, this whole nation and all the wealth of this nation is at the back of these greenbacks, and they cannot depreciate; the whole wealth of the nation supports them and therefore they cannot depreciate, as if we had not seen them sell at less than fifty cents on the dollar, nay, less than forty cents on the dollar. But the whole wealth of the nation is at their back and therefore they cannot depreciate! What did the Senator say when the volume of greenbacks was less by $26,000,000 than it is now? What did he say in 1868 upon this very question of whether the wealth of the nation would prevent the depreciation of the greenbacks? Let us see. It has been read before, but I may be pardoned for reading it again. It is but a sentence or two. In the debate in this body in December, 1868, the Senator said:

Why is our currency depreciated, and why would it be depreciated if the Government did not owe a single bond?

Then he answers his question:

Because the greenback note is a promise by the Government to pay so many dollars on demand which it does not pay. The promise is daily broken, and has long been dishonored. The note draws no interest, and the Government has fixed no time when it will pay it. Under such circumstances the note must be depreciated.

Now comes what I beg the attention of the Senate to:

The solvency or ultimate ability of the promiser never kept overdue paper at par, and never will. To do that something more is required than the ultimate wealth or ability of the promiser. There must be certainty in the payment and time of payment, and if the time of payment be deferred, compensation must be made by the payment of interest.

That is what the Senator said then. Then he said that the wealth of the promiser never could keep overdue paper at par or prevent its depreciation; and now he treats with scorn and ridicule anything that looks like, in one, two, three, four, or five years, a redemption of this paper in coin. Why, Mr. President, what then was the Senator's view on the subject of redemption? You have heard it. I need not repeat it; it has been again and again. Then he was in favor of a return to specie payments, and then he attributed to the very fact of our having a depreciated currency that stagnation in business of which he spoke, and which now he attributes to the want of sufficient currency!

Well, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to raise any question as to the Senator's record from any personal consideration. I do not quote these things to convict him of inconsistency. Every man who has been in public life has been inconsistent apparently, and certainly it is no evidence that a man is wrong that he may upon further reflection have seen proper to change his views. I do not complain of that. I read that for the purpose of showing what was the former judgment of the Senator, and putting his reason then against his reason now; quoting his reason when the country was calm and undisturbed, when no political "Old Probabilities" had foretold the political atmosphere for the next twenty-four hours, with his judgment now, when the signal service has telegraphed that there is danger of a storm.

Before I proceed any further I should like to know how much of my ten minutes is left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. I might as well devote that time to answering a remark the Senator made the other day, that I would find it difficult to point out in the message of the President of the United States anything like such a recommendation as I suggested was to be found in that document. Well, sir, let us see whether it is difficult to find out. In the annual message of the President he says, speaking of this very panic, mark you, that happened last fall, and which is now made the pretext for extending the currency:

My own judgment is that, however much individuals may have suffered, one long step has been taken toward specie payments;—

That is, the panic was a long step toward specie payments—that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached.

That is what the President says. Now, the Senator scouts the idea of a specie basis in one year, two years, three years, four years, five years, while the President whom he supports, and with so much ability too, says that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached. But that is not all. What further says the President? After speaking on the elasticity of the currency he says:

The exact medium is specie—

That is, the medium between too great inflation on the one hand and too great a contraction on the other.

The exact medium is specie, the recognized medium of exchange the world over. That obtained, we shall have a currency of an exact degree of elasticity. If there be too much of it for the legitimate purposes of trade and commerce, it will flow out of the country. If too little, the reverse will result.

But the President did not stop there. On page 14 he says:

These suggestions are thrown out for your consideration, without any recommendation that they shall be adopted literally, but hoping that the best method may be arrived at to secure such an elasticity of the currency as will keep employed all the industries of the country—and prevent such an inflation as will put off indefinitely the resumption of specie payments, an object so devoutly to be wished for by all, and by none more earnestly than the class of people most directly interested—those who "earn their bread by the sweat of their brow."

Now mark—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. Will not the Senator allow me a moment to reply to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair deems it proper to say that the Senator from Illinois may yield to an interruption but he cannot yield his time to the Senator from Indiana, as the Chair understands the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I will proceed.

Mr. MORTON. I think that has not been the course here.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator from Indiana will be allowed to proceed by unanimous consent; but if that be done, if anything is said that requires me to answer him, I wish to have the privilege of doing so.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will give the Senator from Ohio my ten minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Indiana will withhold his reply until he can move an amendment, and then he will come within the rule.

Mr. MORTON. All right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not myself object to it; but the Senator can have the floor regularly in a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech; but I was somewhat surprised this morning, when this question came up to be considered, that the chairman of the Committee on Finance should immediately rise to address the Senate after he was so earnest yesterday in desiring a vote and insisting on our sitting out the bill to-day, and after noticing that yesterday morning he commenced the debate also and then it had to go the rounds. I know very well that when such a debate is commenced several persons desire to speak. Noticing what he said this morning and remembering what he said yesterday morning, I see that we have a repetition of exactly the same speech every day on his part, (and perhaps I might say a repetition on our part, but I will not say that,) and it is an attempt to alarm us because there is no redemption. It is certainly very strange that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is so thoroughly wedded to his idea of having a 5 per cent. bond to go into the hands of some person, on which the Government or the people shall pay interest, for the purpose of redeeming the greenbacks, as they are commonly called, that he has to bring it to our notice every day. We remember very well that that is the position of the Senator, and it is unnecessary for him to notify us so frequently in reference to that point.

But let us see why these fears are expressed and why they are to be entertained. Constantly we are told there is no redemption. Is there not the same redemption for the national-bank currency that may be issued under any bill, if one should pass the Congress of the United States now, as there is at present? The Senator well knows that the thirty-second section of the banking law provides the ways and means for the redemption of the national-bank currency. He has not attempted, in any bill that he has offered here, to change the character of the redemption of the national-bank notes in any way whatever. The only thing he has attempted here has been to provide a redemption for the greenbacks in the form of a bond drawing 5 per cent. interest. If he desires to change the mode and manner of redeeming the national-bank currency, that is a question which is before the Senate now. We have passed from the other matters; and the discussion now is in reference to increasing the national-bank currency. What attempt has he ever made, in any bill that he has ever presented to the Senate, for a change of the mode of redemption of national-bank currency? None whatever. It stands just as the law is to-day providing the mode and manner by which national-bank currency shall be redeemed in greenbacks. There is the redemption for it thus provided in the law, and the Senator knows it.

Some remarks were made by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] about the character of the speeches made here in the Senate. I have nothing to say in reference to that. Every Senator is responsible for the manner of his own speaking. I do not suppose a solitary Senator has been influenced here at any time during this debate by what any other Senator has said; I have no idea that any one has, and I intended this morning when I came here to say nothing, for I was very desirous that we should proceed to vote for the purpose of ascertaining the judgment of the Senate on these separate propositions, so that we might arrive finally at some conclusion as to whether a bill should be passed or a bill should not be passed; and that is my greatest desire now.

I think there might be some changes in the national banking law that would make it better. I would vote for some myself that would make it better than I think it is now; but inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio is so desirous of knowing, and persists every morning in asking, "What do you intend to do about redemption?" I will answer him. The Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] offered a proposition yesterday for redemption, and the Senator from Ohio voted against it. I voted against it, because I do not see any necessity for any redemption being provided other than is provided in the law as it stands now; as far as the national-bank notes are concerned, they to be redeemed in greenbacks. It might probably be better to change it, but not in the manner in which the Senator from Ohio proposes to change it. When a redemption is proposed that is not agreeable to some of us, or not agreeable to him I will say, the Senator votes against it; that is to say, there is but one kind of redemption that can be fixed that is agreeable to him, and that is his own.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will vote for any plan that may be proposed looking to the redemption; or, if any Senator will submit any plan or project, mine being stricken out, I will vote for anything tending to advance greenbacks to par in gold.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know of any plan of redemption of greenbacks except by gold. When you redeem them in a bond, that is only the credit of the Government sent out again—that is no redemption; it is a mere change of the form of indebtedness; it is not a redemption at all. The Senator says he will vote for any redemption. Will he vote for a gold redemption now? He has said often that he did not believe we could come to specie payments; time and again he has said that he does not believe we can do it now. What kind of redemption, then, does he want? He wants some mysterious thing that in its circle going the rounds is least understood by all men, and perhaps as little by himself as by others; something, no man can tell what, but something, and for what? Merely to defeat any proposition for an increase of the currency. That is the meaning of this debate that commences here every morning. It means procrastination and a determination, by all possible honorable means, to defeat the proposition. I have no objection to that; Senators have a right to do it; but that is the meaning of this repetition of the same thing over and over and over again, and after the bond redemption that is spoken of has been voted on five different times in this Senate! The very proposition substantially that he makes has been voted down five times, and sometimes by a vote of almost two to one; and yet he insists that there must be a redemption of some kind in this bill other than that which is provided in the law as it exists to-day. If the law as it exists to-day is not proper in reference to the redemption of the national-bank currency, why did not the chairman of the Committee on Finance propose to change it when the law was passed? He was in Congress and on the same committee; he was a part then of the Congress and of the committee that made this banking law; and why did he not change the redemption then of the national-bank currency and make it different from what it is now? He made no attempt to do it whatever. None has been made. But this is merely an attempt to drive from their position certain Senators here and to alarm them, if possible, or at least to alarm the country. As all may not understand the mode of redemption provided for in the national-bank act, he tries to leave the impression on the country that we are going wild and turning everything loose without any provision made for it. Whatever increase of currency may be passed here, if any is passed, will be subject to this very law that provides now for the redemption of the national-bank notes at the sub-treasuries of the United States in greenbacks. It is the only redemption, except a bond redemption, that any Senator on this floor has proposed save the Senator from New Jersey. His proposition was a gold one, and that proposition, I believe, received but eighteen votes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My proposition was not to redeem the national-bank currency in gold.

Mr. LOGAN. To redeem the greenbacks. Well, when you redeem the greenbacks in gold, perforce the national-bank currency must be redeemed in gold. That is a natural consequence, and the one is the same as the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. As the Chair understands the question, the Senator from Illinois moved an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina. To that there was an amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia and accepted by the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from West Virginia moves to amend the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, and he has accepted that amendment; and the question now is, does the Senator from Illinois, who moved the original proposition, accept the amendment? for it is for him to accept or reject it.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the Senator from Georgia to say that he was willing to accept the third section in the original bill with the change suggested by me, making Pennsylvania the basis instead of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is so; but the Chair understands that the Senator from Illinois accepted the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, and it is for him now to determine whether he accepts this amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. If I may be permitted to state in a very short time my position in reference to that, I desire to do it. I should like to see the Senate determine whether or not a Western or a Southern State shall be entitled to the same privileges as one of the New England States. Maine being the one having the least amount of circulation, I believe, of any of the New England States, I should like to see a vote taken to decide whether or not the Senate proposes to say that other States shall not be placed on an equality with one of those States. I would prefer that, and I would prefer a square vote on free banking to either of them. But if the friends of this measure prefer to make Pennsylvania the basis, and think it has any greater show of passing the Senate in that form than with the State of Maine as the basis, which was named in the amendment that I have accepted, it does not give as I think what is right, but I am willing for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate to accept that proposition now and let the Senate express its opinion about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois, then, accepts the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. MERRIMON. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is not to the substitute proposed by myself, as I understand it, but to the section.

Mr. LOGAN. It was to the third section of the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stands corrected. It is an amendment to the third section of the original bill.

Mr. LOGAN. A substitute for that section.

Mr. HAMLIN. There have been several amendments and, I believe, as many exceptions to this piece of paper, and I want to hear it just as it now stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only to strike out "New York" and insert "Pennsylvania" in the third section of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is that all? ["Yes."] Then I do not want it read.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand now that in the third section in the bill as reported from the Finance Committee the amendment is to strike out "New York" and insert "Pennsylvania." That is the whole question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Georgia to modify his amendment, and that modification is accepted by the Senator from Illinois; so that the question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to strike out "New York" and insert "Pennsylvania" in the third section of the bill.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] allow me enough of his time to say that I should be glad if both he and the Senator from Georgia would withdraw their amendments, so as to let the Senate take a fair and square vote on free banking, as presented by the Senator from Illinois? I should be glad to have a fair and square vote on that question, and then let this amendment come after, if it is not adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, the previous amendments having been withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the bill will be amendable after "Pennsylvania" shall be substituted for "New York." If that be done, and free banking can then be tested as well after this section shall be perfected as now, and I believe it will be stronger and it ought to be stronger with Pennsylvania in. I offered Pennsylvania in the spirit of compromise, it being much lower than Maine.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to ask one question as to the effect of this vote. My intention in offering the amendment in the form I did was to vote the section upon the bill, and not simply to vote as to whether the section should contain the words "New York" or "Maine." I wanted to get a vote on the adoption of that section as amended, and I so understand the Senator from West Virginia. Now the question is whether we shall have to take two votes on this section, one on striking out and inserting, and the other upon adopting the section.

Mr. LOGAN. The question stands thus, as I understand it: I offered my amendment as a substitute; I accepted the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to my amendment, thereby making it a substitute.

Mr. GORDON. I so understood.

Mr. LOGAN. If it is carried, it becomes a substitute for the third section, and then it is subject to such amendments as substitutes are subject to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia to strike out "New York" and insert "Pennsylvania" in the third section. ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to assure my friends that I am not going to postpone a vote. Two or three statements have been made varying somewhat as to the effect of this vote, and as I have put the Comptroller of the Currency to the trouble of making a statement for me as to the effect of it, which it will take but a moment to present, it may be agreeable to the Senate to know what it is. Taking the banking circulation of Pennsylvania as the basis, the Comptroller's table shows this:

Circulation of Pennsylvania, November 1, 1873, $42,055,781.
One-half, $21,027,890, on a population of 3,521,951 is, per capita, $5.97.
One-half, $21,027,890, on a wealth of $3,808,340,112, is, ratio, .0055.
Total population, 1870, 38,558,371, at $5.97	$230,193,474
Total wealth, 1870, $30,068,918,507 at .0055	165,379,051
Total circulation, if distributed in same ratio as Pennsylvania	395,572,525
To this must be added the amount now held by the States which are in excess of above ratio	69,250,626
	464,823,151
Less circulation already authorized	354,000,000
Additional amount required to bring all States up to ratio of Pennsylvania, leaving those in excess all they now have	110,823,151

A remark which fell from the Senator from Georgia leads me to submit also another brief statement. He seems to think that those who believe that Southern States, or deficient States somewhere, are not in condition to subscribe for the added bank circulation cannot rationally at the same time regard this as inflation. In order to show that the distribution of this $110,000,000, nearly $111,000,000, in excess will not be an appeal merely to the deficient States to which he refers, I present this statement from the Comptroller of the Currency:

Statement showing the circulation of certain States, and an apportionment to the same States upon the basis of the circulation of Maine and Pennsylvania.

States.	Circulation authorized November 1, 1873.	Apportionment on basis of Maine.	Apportionment on basis of Pennsylvania.
New York	$60,976,006	$102,809,331	$61,919,698
Ohio	23,876,370	42,765,112	28,206,469
Indiana	14,706,415	25,340,152	17,008,395
Illinois	17,824,209	40,654,626	26,832,392
Virginia	3,902,342	12,351,306	9,566,958
West Virginia	2,360,307	5,021,381	3,687,406
North Carolina	1,819,300	9,855,418	7,830,190
Georgia	2,365,605	10,662,242	8,544,061
Minnesota	3,330,414	5,441,478	3,884,046
Additional circulation required to bring all States up to Maine			$280,274,824
Additional circulation required to bring all States up to Pennsylvania			110,823,151

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator to submit that as a table of all of the States in which the bank circulation is below that of Pennsylvania?

Mr. CONKLING. O, no. This is a selection of nine States, here and there, to illustrate without going through the whole thirty-seven States. It shows merely as to these nine States what the addition would be. Of course there are other States in respect of which it would be much more.

Mr. BOGY. What would be the augmentation on the basis of New York?

Mr. CONKLING. Without a precise calculation in regard to that, my understanding is this: the increase at this moment proposed being in round numbers $111,000,000, that sum exceeds by about $10,000,000 the increase as it would be upon the basis of New York.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that it is $124,000,000, in round numbers, on the basis of New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think my friend from West Virginia has fallen into an error, because this table shows that on the basis of Pennsylvania the increase is $111,000,000.

Mr. CONKLING. I rather think the Senator from West Virginia is in error. He seems to understand that the basis of New York is greater than the basis of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. By $14,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I have the Comptroller's statement to that effect.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought he said by $24,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I said in round numbers the increase on the basis of New York would be $124,000,000.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be the difference between $124,000,000 and $111,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senators are both wrong in the matter of figures. The Comptroller had not carefully made the statement at the time he gave the figures to the Senator from West Virginia which are being used by him. But the statement presented by the Senator from New York is the revised estimate, and by that, on the basis of Pennsylvania, New York gets an increase of $1,000,000.

Mr. CONKLING. More than a million.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated the other day that on a correct statement the amount would not vary from $100,000,000 on the basis of New York; of Pennsylvania, $110,000,000; and of Maine, the large amount which has been stated to-day. But the basis of New York is less than the basis of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator from Ohio is right. I was staggered by the figures of the Senator from West Virginia, misunderstanding them and thinking he had supposed the difference was $24,000,000. I may say without impropriety that the Comptroller of the Currency said to me verbally, without there being time to look at the table and add to this statement, that the basis of Pennsylvania was as I have already said $10,000,000 in round numbers more than that of New York; so that by taking Pennsylvania as the standard we should add to the increase of circulation about $10,000,000 more than we should have if we took New York as the standard; and that is fortified by these figures which show that under the redistribution upon the standard of Pennsylvania New York would receive more than a million in excess of her present bank currency.

Mr. DAVIS. I hold in my hand a statement from the Comptroller, and his exact figures are $124,062,267, as the increase on the basis of New York.

Mr. CONKLING. When were those figures made?

Mr. DAVIS. I received them yesterday evening.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator will find on revision that that is an error.

Mr. DAVIS. I think perhaps we fell into an error by not calculating the enormous wealth of New York over other States. It is well known now that if you take the excess of Pennsylvania under the old apportionment it is $3,000,000, in round numbers; take that of New York and you find it is two and a half millions, in round numbers.

Mr. MORTON. What is the difference in the excess between those States?

Mr. DAVIS. At present?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. New York has two millions and a half excess in round numbers, and Pennsylvania has three millions and nearly a half in excess. But recollect New York's wealth is so much greater than that of any other State perhaps, except Massachusetts, that it makes its proportion larger per capita than any other State out of New England.

Mr. MORTON. What increase, for example, on your calculations would be given to Indiana on the basis of Pennsylvania?

Mr. DAVIS. The basis of Pennsylvania will give an increase to Indiana of $2,301,980, as made up by the Comptroller.

Mr. MORTON. There must be some error, because the calculation furnished by the Senator from New York gives Indiana $3,000,000, while the aggregate is $10,000,000 less.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg pardon of the Senator from Indiana. The statement that I read corresponds exactly with that of the Senator from New York. There is not a figure different.

Mr. MORTON. I thought the aggregate was less.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the aggregate?

Mr. DAVIS. The aggregate of Indiana at present is $14,706,415.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; that is according to the table I submitted.

Mr. DAVIS. Under an apportionment on the basis of Pennsylvania it would be $17,008,395.

Mr. CONKLING. The figures are the same.

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly the same.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It appears to me that we are laboring under the impression that certain sections of the country are suffering great injustice because they have not their proper share or proportion of banking facilities and banking currency; and this section of the bill proposes to make a distribution based upon the amount now located in the State of Pennsylvania. Suppose that is the right basis; if we shall adopt this amendment and enact this proposition into a law, each and every section of the country will be entitled to precisely a just proportion of banking facilities and bank currency; but I should like to know how long justice would be carried out toward every section of the country. I should like to know why to-morrow or next day there will not come up a cry to the American Senate for a redistribution because some other section of the country has less than its proper proportion of banking facilities. It seems to me it cannot be prevented; and in consequence of this it seems to me that this entire proposition is one that will never meet the difficulty.

Mr. FENTON. Before the vote is taken I wish to say that I am opposed to this proposition, not because it asserts free banking; I am in favor of free banking, as I have before stated from my place in this Chamber, with adequate security and redemption features. This proposition as it now stands provides for no redemption at all; and as there is nothing in the law outside of this amendment which practically secures this end, it seems to me that it is better to term this proposition one for free license in banking instead of free banking.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me, right there?

Mr. FENTON. In one moment. It is a license to emit an additional amount of paper money without making any provision for its payment. It is that and nothing else.

The proposition which I had the honor to submit last evening involved a sound principle; something upon which we could safely stand. It did not propose a contraction of the currency. It did not threaten to disturb any legitimate business interest, but it offered those safeguards which have heretofore been deemed so essential to a sound banking policy. I did not expect that those who are in favor of an unguarded increase of the volume of the currency would vote for it. I did not expect that they would favor any of those careful security and redemption features which experience has shown to be necessary to the operation of a sound system. In this I was not disappointed, and I shall not be disappointed now if this amendment be adopted; but I submit it is better for the friends of this amendment to declare in the title that it is a bill to perpetuate an irredeemable currency and to give free license to banking to the extent of $110,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The movement of things this morning has rather attracted my curiosity. It is said now that this precise proposition is a question of free banking. I can hardly understand it in that light, although the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and my friend who sits near me from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] talk about this being free banking. It is not free banking in that enlarged and catholic sense for which I could go.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely want to say that the Senator misrepresents me by saying that I say this is free banking. I say it is not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator need not have the slightest occasion to interrupt if he will wait until I get on one or two sentences. What is observable on all hands is that we divide radically on two questions: one of inflation and the other of holding the Government of the United States to a performance of its pledge to redeem a portion of the paper money which now circulates as currency, and thus to perform its obligation and thus come back to the standard of values fixed by the Constitution. That that is a duty, nobody in the Senate has undertaken to deny. Why not perform it now? "We are not ready," we are told. Very well, if you are not ready to perform it now, why do you insist upon making it impossible in the future? Answer me that. If you cannot do it to-day, say so honestly. It may not be necessary for you to go into insolvency; it may be that we can bear the depreciated currency longer; it may be that a suffering people, for whom certain gentlemen par excellence assume to speak here, can stand your depreciated currency longer; it may be that while we are hesitating to perform our duty here the people who are engaged in the industry of the country can stand it to have this currency fluctuating as in three or four days under our action from 9 to 15 per cent.; and be solaced with the idea that we who stand here and insist that the Government shall go back to its pledges and its promises, at least begin to do it, are hostile to the interests of the people! I have not so understood it.

I was not a little surprised that my honorable friend who sits beside me here [Mr. MORTON] sounds the key-note to-day that it is sacrilege to be devoted to the standard of value indicated by the text of the Constitution of the United States; that we who hold that gold and silver are the true standard of value fixed by the Constitution are idolaters. That is rather a bold, not to say audacious figure, allow me to say to the honorable Senator.

Mr. MORTON. Not true?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir, it is a loyal devotion to a great fact which underlies all our prosperity. The honorable Senator from Indiana may attempt to ignore it; but all history points to it, and the moment you cut away from the constitutional provision of the standard of values, you are afloat in an illimitable sea; Heaven only knows when and where you are to make a harbor of refuge. There is no such delusion in this age as the one that the Senator, I say it with respect, is inculcating in the American mind at the present time. It is against all teachings of history. No such sentiment was ever before uttered on the floor of the Senate. The history of the fathers, the history of the Constitution, the history of all legislation in this country, and all tradition, is against it. I repeat, sir, the assumption that we may cut loose from the constitutional standard of values and are at liberty to fix a paper standard in lieu thereof is a delusion and a snare. Nay, sir, if there were any probability that such policy could obtain in a period of profound peace under the sanction of Congress, it would come to be regarded as a great political crime.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator is entirely confident that his opinions are sound on this question, why so timid? He is bold enough when in the right. Why not walk up to this man-fashion? I am for free banking. The Government performing all its obligations, you may have all the money you can pay for; not all the paper you can print denominated money, but all the money anybody anywhere may want to bank on. I say, the Government of the country performing its obligations and taking its irredeemable promises out of circulation, then bank without limitation. But this idea of banking on irredeemable paper is an anomaly, and nobody knows its consequences better than the honorable Senator, as his former record indelibly fixed in the records of Congress will show. Why does he hesitate? Why this limitation of your circulation? If you want irredeemable paper money, why not have it ad libitum? You fix on Maine, first. Well, that would do very well as the minimum of distribution. Why not take it? Why all this legislative courtesy between inflationists on this side and the other this morning? Why this balancing? Was $268,000,000 of currency which you would get on the Maine basis more than you could carry? Why not carry it? Why come back to Pennsylvania and say $111,000,000? Is that enough? Does my honorable friend think $268,000,000 more than they can carry, more than the country will stand? I only put this, not by way of reproach, but simply to illustrate the absurdity of the whole thing.

No man here dare—my honorable friend who sits near me, who dares as much as any man in the right, does not dare to take the responsibility of unrestricted free banking upon irredeemable paper. But on my proposition he dare do it, because therein there is safety; because therein you come back to the great standard of the Constitution always and at all times, and that is self-regulating. Then you have just so much money as the business of the country justifies, just so much as the business of the country demands; but here under this proposed policy you have just so much paper currency as under an excitement such as prevails at the present time you can induce Congress to vote.

Mr. President, if this is an interpretation of banking by Congress and through the agency of Congress, it requires no prophet to foretell what the consequences of this system will be if it is perpetuated. The volume of currency voted up to-day and voted down to-morrow under the leadership of any gentleman who can command the country sufficiently to back him. Is not that so? Will the people of this country commit themselves to the policy of a volume of the currency dependent on the votes of Congress?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The State of Maine is entitled to less than $5,000,000 of the national-bank note currency properly; but she got over $8,000,000, banking on irredeemable paper, and has flourished as she never did before. Now, when we do not ask that amount, but ask something in the way of equalization, the Senator comes forward and says that such banking is a crime. He is willing that Maine shall hold on to this crime, but Indiana must not participate more than she has done in the crime!

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator might have taken his own time to have said as much as that, because there is scarcely a particle of justification in the statement any way. Maine has got what she has because Indiana would not take what was offered to her. Does not the Senator know that?

Mr. MORTON. No.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Maine has got more because Indiana would not take her portion offered to her when the great interests of the country demanded a sacrifice. Is not that so?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator will be allowed to go on, though the rule has been applied to me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; the Senator from Maine will take another opportunity to address himself to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I always like to hear my friend, whether he is on my side or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, as the Chair understands, to strike out "New York" in the third section of the bill and insert "Pennsylvania."

Mr. SHERMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Before the vote is taken I again call the attention of my friend from West Virginia and my friend from Georgia to the suggestion that they withdraw their amendments temporarily, and allow the votes to be taken on free banking pure and simple.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that they have declined to withdraw their amendments; and the question is on the amendment as stated by the Chair. The Secretary will proceed with the roll-call.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. WEST.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. FERRY. He, if present, would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD, who is at home sick, being too unwell to be in the Senate. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea," on this motion.

The call of the roll having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Sprague, and Tipton—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Ransom, Stevenson, Stockton, West, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I now offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the third section:

Provided, That the maximum limit of fractional currency issued for circulation shall be fixed at $40,000,000, and any excess beyond that amount which may be outstanding shall be withdrawn as early as practicable and canceled.

I think it will be admitted by all that there is a vast excess of fractional currency in circulation, so much that it is almost a positive nuisance. The practice of governments throughout the world has been as far as possible to allow the ordinary retail transactions to be conducted in specie. To that end the first national bank that was created under our Government was limited to a circulation of bills of ten dollars and upward, and the second charter to five dollars and upward. The practice under the Bank of England is to issue nothing less than notes for five pounds, or twenty-five dollars.

The evils of this small-paper circulation were frequently discussed when the democratic party was in power in 1832 and 1833, and by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodbury, in 1841. Senators, if they have any desire to delve in these old documents, will find a vast deal of information in relation to paper currency if they will turn back to the doctrines then enunciated by the great democratic party.

Now, Mr. President, there is, besides the actual fact of a vast excess of this fractional currency being in circulation, another fact that I desire to call attention to. The twenty-five-cent denomination is constantly counterfeited. Now, if each individual of our population of forty millions receives a single twenty-five-cent counterfeit it amounts to $10,000,000 in a year of actual loss. But suppose it is only one-fourth of it, that would be two and a half million dollars a year, and in ten years it would amount to $25,000,000. I submit the proposition to the good sense of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] said that Maine had got nearly double the currency she was entitled to, because Indiana and other States had refused to take it. Under the law, that which was apportioned to each State was to stand to its credit until it was ready to take it, but other States rushed in in 1865 and took it all; and when Indiana and other States were prepared from that time forward to take it, it was gone. That is the simple truth of it. Maine got it in violation of law, and Indiana lost it in the same way. This is the simple fact, that our friends are not willing that the Western and Southern States shall have banks on the same terms that they have got them. They want to impose new terms under which new banks will not be established.

My friend says that gold is in the Constitution, that gold is the only god in the Constitution. The Supreme Court have said not. They have said that gold is not in the Constitution; that it is just as competent for Congress to make paper money a legal tender as gold. Silver is in the Constitution as much as gold; they are both mentioned in the same way; and yet silver was dethroned years ago, and was made a legal tender for only five dollars, and may be made a legal tender for nothing; and if Congress has the power to say that silver shall not be a legal tender, it has the same power to say that gold shall not be.

One word in reply to my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] He has thought proper to say that I have made changes. That has been stated on the floor here for a purpose and seems to be repeated for a purpose. I would know how to reply to it out of doors; here I am constrained; but on the question of finance I know nearly all the members of the Senate have changed more or less, and I know that some men have changed half a dozen times since this discussion commenced. Now, Mr. President, there are financial Bourbons; and the financial Bourbon differs from the French Bourbon in one thing. The French Bourbon never forgets anything, but he never learns anything. The financial Bourbon forgets a great many things, but he never learns anything. There is that difference between them.

I may further remark that I am willing to compare my record on the subject with that of any Senator on this floor. I believe I have made some changes, and I expect to make more. There are two classes of men who never change. The first class is dead—the second I need not name. [Laughter.] But I want to read an extract from the President's message that the Senator from Ohio did not. The President is against inflation just as I am, and just, I think, as the great body of the country is. He uses the word "inflation" in the true sense—an increase of the currency beyond the wants of the people; and that is inflation. An increase of the currency to meet the wants of the country is no inflation. Here is what the President said. The President recognized the fact that we had not got enough currency:

In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.

Well, if there is not too much for the dullest period, there must be a great deal too little for the active period of the year. He further goes on to say:

During the last four years the currency has been contracted, directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and "seven-thirty" bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000.

And then he further goes on to show how the currency has been contracted:

During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased; more than twenty-five thousand miles of railroads have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them; millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages, and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now, every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use.

There the President shows that there is no more currency than is wanted in the dullest season of the year, and shows how contraction has been going on in addition to the $63,000,000 that have actually been taken out of the circulation.

Mr. President, what is the use of talking about gold when you have not got it? The Senator from Ohio in all this session has never attempted to tell us how we can resume specie payments. The whole world knows we have not got the gold. The country is in the condition of a man who is rich, who has got a great deal of valuable property, who is in a fine condition, but has not the money. He has got that which is worth the money many times over, but he has not got the money. We have got the country; the country is prosperous; but the gold is not in the country, and everybody knows it; and yet we hear gold talked about here.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator how it is that the State of Texas, the State of Oregon, the State of California, and the State of Nevada, with less resources than most of the States of which he speaks, find no difficulty in having plenty of gold?

Mr. MORTON. So far as Texas is concerned, I am not so well advised about the condition of that State; but I can say in regard to California and Nevada that I believe their banks from the very first declined to receive the legal-tender currency in that country. California has shut it out, and it is the greatest blunder she has made. It has stood in the way of her prosperity all the time. California is a mining State, and Nevada, I believe, is almost exclusively a mining State, and when they insist that the currency of the country shall be gold, my answer is that that is to make the currency that which California and Nevada produce.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will excuse me, the question I asked was how it was that those States, with less values of wheat and such things to sell, can get the gold—a large amount of it—and retain it? When the miners dig the gold they do not give it away; the people have to buy it, and buy it with something. And how do they retain the gold, being such poor States?

Mr. MORTON. Gold is the product of Nevada. That is what people go to Nevada for chiefly, and I believe it has been the policy of the financial men of Nevada to exclude greenbacks from the State, and it has been a blunder, in my opinion. Nevada only had forty-two thousand population in 1870; very few more, I think, than she had six or seven years before, and the probability is that she has got but few more now. She has got gold in abundance; her mountains are full of gold and silver, but she lacks people and she lacks prosperity.

[Mr. JONES addressed the Senate. His remerks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. A dexterous remark interjected by the honorable Senator from Indiana into the few observations which I was making at the close makes it necessary for me to say a word in reply. The remark was that certain communities, referring to the New England States and particularly to the State of Maine, had an undue proportion of the national-bank currency, and that therefore it was a cheap sort of patriotism for a representative of Maine to take the ground now taken by her representative upon this floor. I would have remarked, if my time had permitted, by way of answer, that Maine took precisely what she was authorized to take by law. She took the $5,000,000 as she was authorized according to the rule of distribution. Indiana, so ably represented by my distinguished friend, not choosing or not being in a condition to take the part assigned to her, not having the same desire, possibly not the same ability that she now has to take the part that was assigned to her, it was offered to Maine, and under those circumstances Maine took it.

Mr. MORTON. Offered by an officer in direct violation of the law. That is, he permitted them to take it when they came and asked for it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We were permitted to take it by force of a law that if the currency was not taken up by a certain time it might be distributed to other States; and so it was distributed to those other States. More than that, the Senator himself very well knows that it was distributed under the stimulus of a 10 per cent. tax by way of penalty upon our own State circulation, with which we were content, if we did not do it.

Another reason why Maine should not be reproached for the conduct of her representatives on this floor is that when this condition of things was made known in the Senate in 1870, and we were told that certain States, which I will not denominate delinquent, but those States which had not their share of the circulation under the circumstances to which I have adverted because they did not care to take it, were anxious to take it, did we not, and does not my honorable friend bear witness to the fact that the representatives of Maine on this floor, and I believe every Senator from New England, offered it to them? Did we not, indeed, vote for a redistribution to equalize this circulation and give to those States who found themselves in that condition their fair proportion? And more, does not the honorable Senator know that we have been standing ready and waiting to do that same thing during this entire session? I took occasion very early in the session when that proposition was before the Senate to say that for myself I was ready to vote to equalize the circulation by a contribution from the States who had it in excess.

So I submit, Mr. President, that it comes with an ill grace from my honorable friend from Indiana to turn upon New England and charge upon her that she occupies a position which does not allow her to speak upon this question.

Now one observation more in regard to a remark that fell from the Senator, addressed to me somewhat, and that was that gold and silver were not necessarily by the Constitution the only standards of value, that paper money may be made a legal tender as well as gold and silver. If I misstate the Senator, of course he will correct me.

Mr. MORTON. I said the Supreme Court had declared so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend now repeats it, and by way of giving sanction and efficacy to that statement says that the Supreme Court have so settled it, from which I am to understand that it is his opinion, and that the honorable Senator stands here now to assert the proposition that it is within the ordinary legislative power of the American Congress to make paper money a standard of value. I undertake to say, from a careful reading of the opinions of the Supreme Court, that they have settled no such thing; nor did I ever hear before that it was so pretended. In a great emergency, in such as involved the very life of the nation, the court did say that under such circumstances the Government might issue such paper. But that it could be done as an ordinary act of legislation, or under any other circumstances than such as were enumerated, they took especial pains in every line and in every page of all the opinions to deny; both those which affirmed and those which dissented, to say that it was entirely exceptional, and upon no other ground and under no other circumstances could that legislation be justified. It was put upon the ground of a national emergency. It was put upon that ground as a war measure, and everybody understood and understands at this day, as I had supposed, that it was in the nature of a forced loan. But, Mr. President, I attach no sort of consequence to that further than this: put that assumption of my honorable friend together with the assumption already stated, to which I adverted when I was up before, in regard to the standard of values fixed by the Constitution, and it shows the tendency of sentiment and opinion in the Senate, which I think is a matter greatly to be deplored.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the third section it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the maximum limit of fractional currency issued for circulation shall be fixed at $40,000,000; and any excess beyond that amount which shall be outstanding shall be withdrawn as early as practicable.

Mr. MORTON. That is a contraction of $6,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if he knows what amount is out, and if he knows what amount is supposed to be requisite by the Treasury Department for the transaction of business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. As I have understood, $40,000,000 is considered the very utmost that is required. I think there is now outstanding more than the Senator from Indiana indicated; my impression is about $48,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the third section of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. FERRY. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD.

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. SARGENT. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Iowa, Mr. ALLISON, and the Senator from Nevada, Mr. STEWART, have paired. They are both engaged on a committee to-day. If present, the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay" and the Senator from Nevada would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, and Thurman—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and West—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Ingalls, Kelly, Ransom, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] to strike out the original bill after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute.

Mr. GORDON. Is not the question on the third section of the bill reported by the committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have some amendments to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that all amendments offered to the third section have been rejected.

Mr. MORTON. The question was taken on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, but a vote, I believe, has not been had on the question of making New York the basis.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. O, yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. New York is in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I have waited thus far before offering any amendment to take the place of the second and fourth sections in the hope that the Senators whose vote struck out those sections would propose some measure to take their place. We are brought to the consideration of a choice between two evils. I will now offer the following to take the place of the fourth section, or to come in after the present third section:

That sections 31 and 32 of the national currency act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall keep its lawful money reserves within its own vaults at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on; and all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring and permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. MORTON. I will inquire of the chairman how that affects the question of reserve?

Mr. SHERMAN. This requires the banks to keep their reserves in their vaults. I will state that in the bill as it stands by common consent we have required three-fourths of the reserve to be kept in the vaults of the bank; but this is a section taken from the House bill now pending in the House, and which it seems to me is better, requiring the whole reserve to be kept in the vaults of the bank.

Mr. MORTON. As the law now stands three-fifths of the reserve required to be kept may consist of balances in the redemption cities, as was stated yesterday. Now, will this require the banks to keep the whole 15 per cent. in the one case, or 25 per cent. of greenbacks in the other case, in their own vaults?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very purpose.

Mr. MORTON. So that it repeals that part of the old law which authorizes balances in the redemption cities to be treated as part of the reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Ohio, does it not make the reserve less?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say that this amendment will be followed by a proposition on that point. The bill having come up in this disjointed way, causes some embarrassment; but I will offer a section that will relieve the banks from any requirement of a reserve on their circulation and require them to redeem their circulation at the Treasury of the United States. In other words, I propose to add to this amendment two sections of the House bill, one which provides for actual redemption at the Treasury of the United States, and the other which relieves the banks from the necessity of maintaining any reserve for circulation.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there a provision that gold may be a portion of the reserve?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is so now under the law. Gold has never been demonetized entirely in this country. It may be a part of the reserve now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether his proposition is not to confine the redemption to the banks entirely, to make them redeem at their own counters?

Mr. SHERMAN. As I said, I propose, hereafter, or even now, if it is thought most logical, to offer two sections of the House bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like an answer from the chairman whether it is the object of his amendment to confine the redemption to the bank counters of their several issues?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I propose to have a center of redemption.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Where?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the city of Washington. In other words, as the Senate have voted out every plan for redeeming United States notes, I now propose a practical redemption for bank-bills in greenbacks, taken from the House bill which is before me.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator proposes to confine it to Washington as the point of redemption, then the difficulty of reaching Washington creating obstacles to the facility of redemption will create a discrimination against certain issues distant from the point of redemption. That will be the effect, so that the national currency will not preserve its uniform value in the market.

Mr. SHERMAN. To present to the Senate these questions in their order I will withdraw the amendment that I have offered, and now offer the third section in a modified form, taken from the bill of the House.

Mr. MORTON. I think we ought to have the propositions together, because they are one amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Would it not be better to go on and see what the determination of the Senate is in reference to the third section of the committee's bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is settled; but I will withdraw the amendment, if the Senator desires to offer an amendment to the third section. The third section now stands unaltered.

Mr. LOGAN. With "New York" as the basis?"

Mr. SHERMAN. It is, like the rest of the bill, open to amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I think we want to determine how the bill is to be perfected. This proposition that the Senator is offering, a part of the House bill, is a proposition in connection with free banking. I have lying on my desk a proposition that I propose to offer at some stage of this proceeding for free banking with the proposition of the House, as suggested by the Senator. This proposition of the Senator does not properly belong here unless free banking is adopted, because it is in connection with that part of the House bill. That is a bill for unlimited free banking, providing for redemption in greenbacks at the different sub-treasuries of the United States, requiring the banks to keep 5 per cent. for that purpose in the Treasury of the United States, and then in connection with that it strikes out a portion of their reserve except on deposits, and also inserts this clause that the Senator proposes here, prohibiting all such associations from keeping any portion of their lawful reserve elsewhere than in their own vaults. I have the same proposition on my table in connection with the free-banking bill as offered in the House. It seems to me that it would be better to determine this question, because that proposition will be presented here before we are through.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to make a suggestion to my friend from Ohio and the Senator from Illinois also. Free banking is one thing, and redemption is another. Here the Senator from Ohio desires to propose a method of redemption. Upon the adoption or rejection of that method of redemption it may depend whether a great many of us will vote for free banking or not. If that method of redemption is rejected, I for my part shall vote against free banking; if it be adopted, I may be inclined to vote for free banking. Therefore it seems to me——

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question right there. He says he may be inclined to vote for free banking. I ask him, with that section providing for redemption and with 5 per cent. of greenbacks held in the United States Treasury, will he vote for free banking?

Mr. SCHURZ. I think I shall. I have not read the section. I want to hear it first. The Senator has laid before us only a part of the whole thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have waited, but I will withdraw this amendment now.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I have on my table a proposition for free banking with the redemption section of the House, that I propose to offer in the Senate Chamber before this bill is concluded. Some say that with that redemption they are willing to vote for free banking. I say I will offer free banking in that shape myself, and I have it on my table with that purpose. I do not understand the Senator from Ohio to say that he will vote for free banking with that in. I understood the Senator to say he would not, because I have conversed with him on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me I will explain precisely what I want, because this matter is one that we all ought to pass our votes upon intelligently. I desire to restore the second and fourth sections of this bill in the best form I can get them, and therefore I invite and urge Senators who represent the majority that struck out those sections to give us some substitute, unless they agree with the Senator from Indiana that no substitute is required. I will give way at any time to allow any expedient that will provide for redemption to be offered. But in case none is offered by Senators, I shall move to restore the fourth section by striking out the "70" per cent. reduction and inserting "50," in the hope that some Senators who voted to strike out the section as it stood will vote for at least a diminution of the greenbacks to the amount of 50 per cent. of the additional national-bank notes issued.

Next, I shall move to amend the second section in a different form, postponing the time of redemption one year longer; yes, I would vote for it if it was two years longer off; I would vote for anything that will fix an ultimate day that will make our promises good either in bonds or coin.

These amendments will provide for the redemption of greenbacks, and they cover the redemption of national-bank notes, because if you provide for the redemption of greenbacks you do provide for the redemption of national-bank notes; but if these amendments should be voted down, then I propose to do the next best thing, take the third section as it stands reported by the committee expanding our bank currency $100,000,000 on the basis of New York, and accompanying it with practical redemption by requiring the banks to retain in the Treasury of the United States, either in Washington or New York, or both, a sufficient amount of greenbacks to redeem their bank-notes. I would accompany that with a provision relieving the banks from the reserve on circulation, and requiring them to keep the whole of their reserve on deposits in the vaults of the bank and thus make redemption practical. That with some other sections from the House bill, to which I think there will be no objection, will improve this bill.

If these amendments should be adopted, then I would prefer this expanded free banking on the basis of New York to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina; but if a majority of the Senate have made up their minds to redeem neither the greenbacks nor the bank-notes, then I will take the very smallest number possible of either, and will vote for the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina.

Now I hope, having explained my own personal position, my course will be understood. I shall desire first to perfect the mode of redeeming the greenbacks, by restoring in some form the second and fourth sections of the committee's bill. That failing, I shall seek to make redemption of bank-notes practicable, so that a bank-note can be designated presented for redemption in greenbacks at New York; and if that fails, then I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, and let the bill go to the House.

Mr. SCHURZ. I would suggest to my friend from Ohio that he had better introduce his amendments now. They apply to the section as it stands just as well as they would apply to free banking. When those amendments shall have been voted upon, then some of us will know how to vote upon the proposition for free banking.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Illinois will offer the sections he proposes to offer separately; but if he offers them all at once, I cannot vote for free banking without redemption of greenbacks.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says he cannot vote for free banking without that, but will he vote for it with it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not vote for free banking except with coin redemption.

Mr. LOGAN. Ah! Now in order that the Senator shall have an opportunity of voting for free banking, and let it be determined either one way or the other—that is a question for a majority of the Senate—I offer as a substitute for the third section as it now stands in the bill the first section of the amendment which I offered before, which is free banking without restriction, and in connection with it this section for the purpose of testing whether Senators who claim that they want redemption are in earnest or not:

And every national banking association organized or to be organized under the provisions of the said act, and the several supplements and amendments thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States in lawful money of the United States—a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, which shall be a part of the present reserve now required by law, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation, and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury or to any assistant treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective associations issuing the same; and he shall notify them severally on the first day of each month, or oftener at his discretion, of the amount of such redemption; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed, under penalty of forfeiture of its charter.

There is a redemption provided for, with a forfeiture of charter if they do not comply with it. Then I have a section that I would offer in addition to this, providing that the reserves may be kept in their own vaults, and also providing that the law providing for reserves in reference to circulation be repealed, but that the reserve in reference to deposits shall be maintained. It is similar to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio; but that is a question for the Senate afterward. I offer these two sections as a substitute for the third section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot vote for those sections together. The first section is free banking without any provision for the redemption of the greenbacks whatever, but simply this qualified redemption of bank-notes in legal-tenders. I am willing to apply free banking to the extent of the basis of New York if I cannot get anything better; but it seems to me we ought to take the question on these sections separately, not together.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I propose to test the question of the sense of the Senate on free banking. I offered that before and I accepted amendments. I do not know how the Senate stands on free banking; but inasmuch as I took that position myself, I desire to test the sense of the Senate in reference to it. In this amendment redemption is provided for and so is free banking.

Mr. THURMAN. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, we see the inconvenience of attempting to perfect a great measure like this or to agree upon it in open Senate. Here is a proposition that has not been discussed, an extremely important proposition, one that requires consideration on the part of any Senator before he can vote for it. I do not think we are in any condition to vote on it to-night. I think it requires consideration. I for myself confess that it being an entirely new proposition, at least to me—it may not be to others who have not been kept out of the Senate as I have been by committee work, but to me it is a novel proposition—I want time to consider it. I think this bill had better now be printed as it has been amended.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to correct the Senator. He says this is a new proposition. This proposition of free banking, just as printed now, has been before the Senate for six weeks.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not speaking about free banking. I am ready to vote on the proposition of the Senator from Illinois that he had printed a long time ago, and that he offered some days ago, and have been ready to vote on it ever since it was offered; but he offers that now with a very important qualification annexed to it, which I never heard of until it was suggested here within the last ten minutes. I am not accustomed to vote for measures that I do not consider. I have to do my own thinking to the best of my ability. I think, therefore, the best thing we can do is to print this bill as far as it has been amended and print the pending amendments, which can be done by to-morrow morning, and go into executive session now.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to remind the Senator that the chairman of the committee yesterday suggested that to-day we should finish this measure; and now I hope the Senate will sit it out and finish it one way or the other. I can withdraw the second section of this amendment to accommodate the Senator and take the vote on the first, with the understanding that if it be carried I will offer the second, and then he can have plenty of time to examine it.

Mr. MORTON. Let us take them both together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw the second section of his amendment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. He moves now to strike out the third section of the bill and insert the free-banking section?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I am ready to vote on that.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I understand the question is on the original substitute offered by the Senator from Illinois divested of all the additions which afterward he has put to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; with this statement, that if there is a majority of the Senate for free banking, I will follow it up with this redemption section which I read and with the other section to which I referred.

Mr. SCHURZ. I suggested to the Senator from Ohio to introduce his amendment first before we could take a vote on the question of free banking, for this purpose: I wanted first to see whether any restrictions and checks would be put by the Senate upon this system of free banking before voting upon the principle itself; but if the principle is brought to a vote without any such checks, I shall vote against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that the Senator from Illinois, if he desires it, ought to have an opportunity to have a vote on free banking. It is true it is the same proposition submitted long ago by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] but by voting on it the Senate can choose between free banking and banking on the basis of New York. That is the question, clearly.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senate, because I have nothing to cover up, the reason why I want to test it. If a majority of the Senate is for the principle of free banking, I am ready to go on then and perfect it. If a majority of the Senate is against free banking, there is no use in taking time to perfect it. Hence I desire to test the question, because it will be a question hereafter, and I should like to have it tested now.

Mr. SCHURZ. I will submit to the Senator from Illinois that he cannot test that question in this way at all. We may be in favor of free banking with certain restrictions, with an effective system of redemption, but may be opposed to it without some such checks. That is exactly my case. So if the restrictions are not voted upon first and adopted, I shall surely vote against the principle.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I agree almost perfectly with the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri. I should like to see a system of free banking adopted; but whether I vote for free banking or not, depends very much upon the provisions of the bill authorizing free banking. Banking that is absolutely free, without any restriction, without any safeguard, is not my idea of free banking; and therefore I want to see what guards the Senate will throw around that system before I vote for the system.

Mr. HOWE. I am as much exercised upon this question, perhaps, as any Senator upon the floor. I have over and over again said that, in itself, I was in favor of free banking, but free banking in some conditions of the country I would not favor at all. Just how a man of my opinions should vote on this amendment as it is now presented to the Senate, has been a matter of some little difficulty for me to determine. I have concluded on the whole that, as this is simply a proposition to put free banking upon some bill, I will vote for it. Whether I will vote for the passage of the bill by and by, depends upon the shape the bill appears in when that vote is taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit to the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not embarrass himself. The bill as it now stands provides for banking on the basis of New York. That is the third section of the bill. Now if some provisions for redemption should hereafter be adopted by the Senate, it will be then time enough certainly to insert free banking in place of this qualified free banking; but until a provision for redemption is inserted, why vote for free banking?

Mr. HOWE. I can do but one thing at a time, and I seem to be called upon to vote my impressions upon this one question at this time. I am embarrassed myself; but I do not see how I can embarrass the country by voting to put this amendment upon this bill, because if the bill does not finally come to a vote in such a shape as I think the country can stand it, I shall vote against the passage of the bill, and I certainly shall vote against the passage of the bill if we are called upon to vote for it with $400,000,000 of greenbacks provided for, and with the fourth section or something equivalent to the fourth section of the original bill reported by the Committee on Finance out of it.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very much in the position of my friend from Wisconsin, and I desire, for my own information, to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. He has spoken of following his amendment with a section providing for redemption. Do I understand that section which he proposes to follow this one with to be the section which provides for redemption of the national-bank notes by a deposit of 5 per cent. in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. And not any provision which looks to the redemption of the legal-tender notes themselves?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know how you can redeem them except in gold.

Mr. SCOTT. My vote will be governed very much in the manner that the Senator from Wisconsin has indicated. I am in favor of free banking with proper provisions for the redemption of the legal-tender notes; and if this section shall be voted in—and I shall probably vote for it—I shall feel myself at liberty to vote against the bill unless some provision for the redemption of legal-tender notes be incorporated in it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this is a proposition for unlimited banking without any species of redemption. It is true the Senator from Illinois who moves it says that if adopted he will follow it up by an amendment he had already indicated, providing that 5 per cent. of the reserve of the banks now required by law, instead of being kept in their own vaults or in any of the redemption cities, shall be kept in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of their notes, not in coin, but in greenbacks. To my mind, that is so trivial a measure, it goes to so small an extent if to any extent toward placing the country upon a sound basis, that I cannot vote for this free-banking proposition with no better provision for redemption than that. To my mind it amounts absolutely to nothing in the end, or scarcely anything except this: that it will be of some advantage to the banking institutions of the city of New York, some of whom now will not receive on deposit the notes of national banks from the far West or from the South, but would receive them on deposit if they were redeemable either in New York or here in the city of Washington. But so far as a resumption of specie payments at any time is concerned, it seems to me that that proposition of itself amounts really to nothing at all. The only way that you could make that proposition amount to anything would be by the measure that the majority strike out all the while and oppose all the while, as they do every measure that looks toward an appreciation of greenbacks to gold. Unless you do that, it is in vain that you provide for the redemption of national-bank notes in greenbacks. Unless greenbacks shall approximate toward gold in value, your redemption in greenbacks amounts practically to nothing at all.

Now, Mr. President, it has been said here and elsewhere that those who are opposed to this unlimited banking upon an irredeemable basis, to an unlimited amount of irredeemable bank paper, and paper money of one kind and another, are the friends of the present bank monopoly. Why, sir, the truth of it is that so far from the contractionists here, as they have been called—I am not one of them, for I have been opposed to contraction as well as expansion—so far from the contractionists here representing the national banks, ninety-nine out of every hundred of the national banks are opposed to contraction. So far from those who are opposed to the inflationists here being the advocates or representatives of the banking interest in this country, the entire banking interest, with a few honorable exceptions, are rather in favor of inflation than of contraction. That is the truth about it.

So too, sir, the opponents of inflation here have been stigmatized as the advocates and representatives of Wall street, when the truth is that every gambler in stocks and gold, every villain engaged in thrusting upon the people the securities of rotten corporations, every man who is preying upon the honest industry of the country, in Wall street, is an inflationist; every one of them is an inflationist; and it is well known to everybody who knows what that street is. No, sir; it is not by this unlimited banking on an irredeemable paper currency, this putting away forever the day of any solid currency in this country, that the prosperity of the country is to be increased, or that it is to be benefited in any way whatsoever.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Are you through?

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. LOGAN. I was waiting till the Senator was through.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator was standing so wistfully and he has spoken so seldom that I was anxious to give him an opportunity, and I will do it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very much mistaken; I am not desirous of making a speech; but I was only going to say to him that I would relieve him of his anxiety, if he was willing to accept it at my hands, in reference to this proposition. That was all.

Mr. THURMAN. I am willing to hear the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will not allow me to relieve him, I will wait until he gets through, and then I do not want to make a speech but to make an amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I was stating the amendment as offered by the Senator; but if he wishes to modify it I will take my seat and let him do so.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I do not want to make a speech, or to get up any excitement, for I see we do get up a little excitement occasionally; but I rise to propose a different amendment for the purpose of testing the question. In order to perfect the bill, and thinking that the proposition I before offered may possibly intervene for a moment to prevent the perfecting of the bill, I withdraw this amendment and I will offer another, and then the Senator may proceed. I withdraw the amendment for free banking for the present and offer the section in my hand, and I will state that it is the third section of the original bill reported by the committee with the word "the" inserted after the word "all" and preceding the word "banks," in the third line on the third page; so as to read:

That national banking associations may be organized in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, having a less proportion of national-bank circulation than the State of New York, according to the apportionment made upon the basis of population and wealth by the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1873, until each State and Territory and said District, respectively, has an amount of such bank circulation equal to such proportion of notes then outstanding in the State of New York; and all the banks—

The word "the" there, the definite article, being put in after the word "all"— organized under this section shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now, or hereafter to be, prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by the "national-currency act," approved June 3, 1864; and section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be, and is hereby, repealed.

I move to strike out section 3, and in lieu of it to insert the third section of the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, with the word "the" inserted, so as to make it a different section.

Mr. SCHURZ. What is the object?

Mr. LOGAN. The object is to get a vote on that section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Illinois withdraws his amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the amendment, and offer this third section with the word "the" inserted, as a substitute for the third section as it stands in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the object?

Mr. LOGAN. The object of it is very clear. It is to take the sense of the Senate on that section. That is the object.

Mr. CONKLING. What change does the word "the" make?

Mr. LOGAN. It makes change enough to treat it as a substitute.

Mr. THURMAN. It is no change of sense. It is simply equivalent to a motion to strike out the third section——

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. It is to strike out and insert. It strikes out the third section and puts in the same section with the word "the" added, so as to test the sense of the Senate on that proposition. If the sense of the Senate is to take New York as the point to commence at, then we can go on and perfect the bill. That is the object, and nothing else.

Mr. SCHURZ. Let us see what the effect of the vote will be either way. If we adopt the substitute, then we shall have the same section only with the word "the" between "all" and "banks." If we reject the substitute, then we shall have the section as it stands now. It seems to me the same.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a vote on the section. We have had no vote on the section yet.

Mr. SCHURZ. And the effect will be that if we refuse to put in the word "the" it will leave the section just as it stands.

Mr. LOGAN. But I want the vote of the Senate on the section, and that determines it either one way or the other. It makes no difference whether the word "the" is put in or left out; we get a vote of the Senate on that section, and that is what I desire.

Mr. CONKLING. What does that vote mean after we get it?

Mr. LOGAN. If we carry it you will find out what it means.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this parliamentary novelty should be adopted, what difference would it make?

Mr. MORTON. I think I can state.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe I have the floor at this moment. It does not make one particle of difference. This section stands now in the bill. If you want to test the sense of the Senate as to whether they want it or not, move to strike it out; and if the Senate say they will not strike it out, it is in the bill. That is all there is about it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; a vote will not hurt it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But you move to strike out and insert the same thing. That is a novel proposition. You do not gain anything by it. Hereafter it may be stricken out by a vote.

Mr. LOGAN. One Senator laughs at this, and another says that it is a novel proposition. I do not care whether it is a novel proposition or not. It is a proposition under the rules, and it is an amendment that I have a right to move. The sense of the Senate has not yet been tested as to whether this section with "New York" in it is the judgment of the Senate as to the basis for bank circulation. That is the position it is in before the Senate. When the amendment was moved to put in "Maine," an amendment to put in "Pennsylvania" was accepted; but that amendment was defeated by one vote. There has been no vote on this section whatever.

Now, let me put a proposition to the Senator from Ohio, because I am I think fair about this thing; I desire to be, anyhow. I do not propose, as one of the friends of an increase of the currency, to stand here, if I can prevent it, and see propositions put upon this measure that when we come into the Senate will cause the bill to be defeated. Now, I want to see how many members of the Senate are in favor of retaining this section in the bill by substituting the amendment that I have moved for the original section. If that be done, then it becomes a part of the bill. I want to see that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a part of the bill now.

Mr. LOGAN. It has never been voted on, and I have no means of knowing now, nor has any other Senator, what the sense of the Senate is on that proposition. If you take it for granted (and that is the proposition) that we agree to it, when the bill gets out of committee and comes into the Senate, no one knows whether it is a proposition that will be accepted by the Senate or not. I desire to know that because I desire to have things done on a rule which we can all understand as we go along.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to put a question to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. SCHURZ. He moves to strike out the third section and then to insert again the whole of the third section with one word added to it which does not alter the sense of the section at all. So, virtually, as the Senator from Ohio has already remarked, he moves to strike out the third section and then to insert the third section again in its place. That is all. Now, I should like to know what the meaning of that vote will be. Suppose I vote for the substitute, then I retain the third section. Suppose I vote against the substitute, then I retain the third section again.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I will tell him what is to be the effect of it, though I do not know that he will object to that. If the motion prevails to strike out and insert this, you cannot amend the matter inserted.

Mr. CONKLING. By striking out, but you can add to it.

Mr. THURMAN. You cannot afterward strike it out.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the only effect of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator see the point now?

Mr. SCHURZ. Now I do see that point; but at any rate I do not see that it is a vote of the Senate upon the success of the section a bit.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a mere matter of judgment. I know what I am doing, I think. I propose to have a vote on this section, and if my proposition is substituted it becomes a part of the bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. It is a part of the bill now.

Mr. LOGAN. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. I can move to strike it out this minute.

Mr. GORDON. Allow me to say one word. The amendment providing for $400,000,000 of United States notes has been adopted by the Senate. This third section has not been adopted by the Senate. The Senator from Illinois wishes in common with those of us who have voted together for that amount of greenbacks, to adopt the third section of this bill and attach it to the $400,000,000 clause as a part of a bill to be voted on as an entirety hereafter. That is the whole question. We cannot get it before the Senate in any other way.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Georgia, of course, does not wish to deceive himself, as we know that he does not wish to deceive the rest of us. Therefore the only explanation of his remark is that he forgets entirely that the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole. Suppose no vote is taken on the third section, the bill is reported to the Senate; what is the first question? Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole? If this third section is left to stand, it appears in the Senate with every chance in its favor that it would have if it be amended or be stricken out and reinserted in Committee of the Whole; so that the only possible effect of this vote, the only fair effect, I mean—I do not suppose anybody is trying to cheat anybody else—I do not mean to intimate that——

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. The only fair effect, and the only parliamentary effect, of such a motion as the Senator from Illinois now makes is to lead the Senate to express an opinion which means absolutely nothing whichever way it may be, but which, by the mere process of expression, will deprive the Senate in Committee of the Whole of the possibility of striking out or altering any part of this section. Afterward, in Committee of the Whole, it will be competent to add to it, but not to change, even in the estimation of a hair, anything that is there. Why? Because everything now there will have been stricken out, and everything found there will have been put in; and so that must remain until you reach the Senate. Then the question will be, will the Senate concur with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole? This will be one of the amendments.

Therefore the Senator from Georgia is quite mistaken if he supposes that, in order to have this section go from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate as part of the bill, it is necessary in this way or in any way to vote upon it. The bill is in Committee of the Whole, subject to amendment. In so far as it is not amended, it is reported to the Senate. In so far as it is amended, the action of the Committee of the Whole in the form of an amendment is also reported to the Senate. The first question is, will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole? That done, the next question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Therefore there is nothing, I beg to say, to be gained by such a vote as this, except that we burn the bridges behind us; we put it out of our power in Committee of the Whole to go back to alter this section. Add to it we may; change it never, after we have stricken it out and inserted it again.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken in one point of view. A substitute may be adopted for the whole bill after this is done. So it does not leave it out of the power of the Senate to change, because it may change the whole measure by substituting another bill for it. But if it makes no difference with so experienced Senators as the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Missouri, why do they oppose this proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. Why do you propose it?

Mr. LOGAN. Why do I propose it? I propose it, as I said, because I know what I am doing. I desire to get a vote of the Senate on this section. I said awhile ago that we could not otherwise come into the Senate with this bill with any vote on this section. Hence, if we go into the Senate with this section without its being voted upon, the whole bill may be defeated by Senators who agree to these sections voting against the whole bill unless you have the sense of the Senate on it.

My proposition is this; there is no harm in it; it affects nobody, and changes nobody's mind; it is to make this a substitute for the section and thus make it a part of the bill; and then we have the sense of the Senate on the proposition whether that shall be the basis of the circulation of the national banks or not. The section was reported by the Committee on Finance as a part of their bill, and it seems to me that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, being anxious, as he ought to be, to get some portion of his bill, as much as he can, adopted, ought not to object to voting on this section, so as to decide whether it shall remain as part of the bill or not. I cannot see why he desires to object to it. I know it has this effect just as the Senator from New York says, that if it is voted as a substitute, then you cannot strike it out; you may add to it, or you may amend it, or you may put a substitute in place of the whole bill. I will illustrate this. The Senator from North Carolina has a proposition before the Senate now to fix $400,000,000 as the volume of greenbacks, and to add $46,000,000 national-bank circulation. That proposition is in the nature of a substitute for all we may do. If we adopt this proposition then a vote can be taken on his substitute, deciding whether we want $400,000,000 greenbacks and $46,000,000 additional bank currency, or whether the New York basis shall stand with the $400,000,000 greenbacks. It leaves it in that condition precisely, so that either one may be added to, or a substitute can be adopted for the whole, but neither one can be stricken out as an independent proposition. That is the position in which it puts it, and it brings the two propositions squarely before the Senate; the proposition of the Senator from Ohio for $400,000,000 of greenbacks and $46,000,000 increase of national-bank circulation, or the $400,000,000 legal-tenders with an increase of bank currency on the baeis of New York. There are the two separate propositions then standing before the Senate, and either one may be added to or either one acted on. That is the condition of it precisely.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference to the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2782) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota to make final payment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope not. It was understood yesterday——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 29, noes 23.

Mr. MORTON and Mr. SPENCER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 28, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, and Thurman—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, West, and Wright—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Jones, Norwood, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—19.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

AFFAIRS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask leave to present a memorial in behalf of the dominant party of the State of South Carolina in reply to the "tax-payers' memorial" presented yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] asks to present for reference a memorial, the statement of which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Counter-statement and reply of the republican central committee of South Carolina to the memorial of "tax-payers," so called.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRE-EMPTORS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 2782) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota to make final payment; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be put upon its passage at once.

The bill was read. It provides that the time in which pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota, including lands within Fort Ridgely and Sioux Indian reservations, are now required to make final proof and payment, be extended for the period of two years.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MENNONITE SETTLEMENT.

Mr. CLYMER. I beg leave to report from the Committee on the Public Lands a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2121) to enable the Mennonites of Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States.

The SPEAKER. What action does the gentleman propose?

Mr. CLYMER. I wish the House to fix a day for the consideration of this bill. Large numbers of Mennonites are about coming to this country, and will arrive here possibly in May; and if legislation is to be had at all, it should be had promptly. I desire to ask the House to make this bill a special order for Wednesday of next week.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I must ask the gentleman to make the same reservation which has been made with reference to other special orders, to except the regular appropriation bills, which are now far behind.

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly; I will make that reservation. I ask that the bill be made a special order for Wednesday of next week after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a bill (H. R. No. 2783) being a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2121) to enable the Mennonites of Russia to effect permanent settlements on the public lands of the United States.

Mr. CLYMER. I am instructed to report the bill favorably from the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the bill be made a special order for Wednesday next, a week from this day, subject only to the House going into committee on the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. NEGLEY. And other special orders.

Mr. RANDALL. When is it likely this committee will be called, so that bill can be reached in regular order?

The SPEAKER. Of course special orders made previously will take precedence of this special order.

Mr. CLYMER. That committee will not be called for one month, and if this legislation is to be had at all, it is important it should be had now.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to bring to the attention of the House the fact that this continual making of special orders will after awhile bind the House hand and foot, so it cannot get to other business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania mean it shall be made the special order for that day only, or that when reached it shall be the special order for one day only?

Mr. CLYMER. What day only?

The SPEAKER. One day only.

Mr. CLYMER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. For that day only, if reached, and for one day only when reached, at the hour of half-past one.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PRE-EMPTORS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to have some explanation of the bill just passed here, which seemed to be "jumped" through the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] asked and obtained unanimous consent to pass the following bill. It is a bill to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota to make final settlement.

The bill was read. It provides that the time in which pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota, including lands within Fort Ridgely and Sioux Indian reservations, are now required to make final proof and payment, be extended for the period of two years.

Mr. DUNNELL. That bill was placed in my hands to be reported from the Committee on the Public Lands with the recommendation that it do pass. It has been acted on by the Committee on the Public Lands in answer to a memorial to Congress from the Legislature of the State of Minnesota. And I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the frontier counties in that State were last year unfortunately visited by grasshoppers, and the settlements on that frontier in consequence are and have been in a decidedly bad condition. The Legislature of the State of Minnesota has given to these frontier settlements $25,000 during the winter just past, and are now buying seed for them. It will be absolutely impossible for these pre-emptors to pay by next July, as they will be compelled to do, unless we pass this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. My object has been attained. Any bill of that sort, relating to public lands, it seems to me should always be accompanied on its passage by some explanation of the purpose in view. The explanation of the gentleman seems to be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been passed, and the motion to reconsider laid upon the table.

FUR-TRADE OF ALASKA.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill which has been referred to that committee with leave to report at any time, and which, I think, will not take up much time.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business has been demanded. If it takes time, the previous question operating on the bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, of course the bill will be returned to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. If the bill be passed at all, owing to the fact that the vessel sails from San Francisco at a given time, it must be passed now. This action has been requested by the Secretary of the Treasury, in behalf of the Government. Perhaps if gentleman will hear it read they will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. It will be read subject to objection.

Mr. CONGER. It is a bill (H. R. No. 440) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur-trade in the Territory of Alaska.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is thereby, authorized to appoint some person, qualified by experience and education, a special agent for the purpose of visiting the various trading stations and Indian villages in the Territory of Alaska, the seal-islands, and the large islands to the north of them, in Behring Sea, for the purpose of collecting and reporting to him all possible authentic information upon the present condition of the seal-fisheries of Alaska, the haunts and habits of the seal, and the preservation and extension of the fisheries as a source of revenue to the United States; together with like information respecting the fur-bearing animals of Alaska generally, the statistics of the fur trade, and the condition of the people or natives, especially those upon whom the successful prosecution of the fisheries and fur trade is dependent; such agent to receive a compensation of eight dollars per day while actually thus employed, with all actual and necessary traveling expenses incurred therein; provided that the appointment made under the act shall not continue longer than two years.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House now resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872. The main question has been ordered, and the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is entitled to the floor to close the debate. The Chair understood there was no objection to the amendment reported by the committee to the bill. There was some misunderstanding as to whether the amendment reported from the committee had been agreed to. If there be no objection it will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. KENDALL. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, the resolutions adopted on the 28th of March—last Saturday—at a large meeting in the city of Virginia, State of Nevada, being their solemn protest against the passage of this bill as it now comes before the House, with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] attached to it. I suppose, sir, that the objection will be made that this meeting is another scheme of the celebrated "bank ring," about which we hear so much; and I take occasion to say that I know, so far as anything can be known at this distance, that the resolutions of that meeting are a full and fair expression of the general and all but unanimous opinion of the people of Storey County, Nevada, where these mines to which the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] has reference are situate.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIRGINIA, NEVADA, March 28, 1874.

Hon. C. W. KENDALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

A very large meeting held to-night; over two thousand voters present; feeling against NEGLEY's amendment intense. Following resolutions unanimously and enthusiastically adopted. An earnest remonstrance against the passage of amendment is being signed by everybody, and will be forwarded Monday night.

JAMES G. FAIR.

Whereas the amendment to the mining law now pending in Congress, and which, among other things, requires all mining companies on the Comstock lode to apply for patents to their claims within six months, involves matters of great moment and paramount interest to the miners, property-owners, and business men of Storey County; and whereas it is the almost unanimous wish of all the citizens of this county that the aforesaid amendment should be rejected: Therefore.

Resolved by the miners of Storey County in mass meeting assembled, First. That the amendment above referred to is justly regarded as a vital stab at the material prosperity of Storey County and of all the residents thereof.

Secondly. That the effect of the amendment can only be injurious and disastrous to every interest of this people.

Thirdly. That the passage of the amendment will destroy confidence in the mining interests of Storey County; will retard the work of development and prospecting on the Comstock lode; will discourage these energies as deep mining is being carried on; will drive away capital; will depress labor; will depreciate the value of real estate; will tend to annihilate business, and will in all things be to each of us a great and lasting calamity.

Fourthly. That for fourteen years the towns of Virginia and Gold Hill have poured an unceasing stream of wealth into the nation's Treasury, and no good reason exists and none can be given why the great blight threatened by this amendment should be put upon them, their prosperity taken away, and their very existence jeopardized.

Fifthly. That the people who have reared these towns are and have ever been loyal and true to the Government and the flag, and nothing done or omitted by them can warrant the grievous punishment which this proposed action of Congress will certainly inflict.

Sixthly. That to the laboring classes of Storey County the passage of the amendment will bring as great and permanent injury and misfortune as to any other. It must result in a reduction of the number employed, and in the wages of those retained; and that engaged, as we are, in the dangerous business of mining at deep levels, where our lives are in constant danger, we can but earnestly protest against any action of Congress which will tend to reduce our wages and take away from us the means of gaining a livelihood.

Seventhly. That the only benefit possible to come from the adoption of the amendment will redound to the advantage of a grasping monopoly, whose success can only be built upon our ruin, and whose schemes involve the utter destruction of Virginia and Gold Hill, the reduction of the wages of labor, the abandonment of mining except as controlled by it, and finally ruin to the whole people of Storey County.

Eighthly. And resolved, finally, that we earnestly remonstrate against the passage of the amendment heretofore mentioned, and we do appeal to the Congress of the United States, and to the sense of justice and the convictions of right which must ever guide the judgment of honest men, to protect us from this threatened and imminent danger, and by the rejection of the amendment secure us from certain disaster.

Ninthly. That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forthwith forwarded to the Senators and the Representative in Congress of the State of Nevada.

SAMUEL OWEN,
Chairman.
R. H. LINDSAY,
Secretary.

Mr. NEGLEY. I would ask the gentleman from Nevada to have the kindness to allow me to have several telegrams read in connection with the resolutions which have just been read by the Clerk.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman who has charge of the bill [Mr. PAGE] has the disposition of the time; I have not.

Mr. PAGE. I yield to my colleague from California [Mr. HOUGHTON] twenty minutes.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention, when this bill was before the House for consideration to take any part in the debate upon it. I knew that my colleague who had charge of the bill was thoroughly conversant with it. I knew, also, that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] was thoroughly acquainted with it. I was aware of the fact that this bill had received the approval of the Senate, after a thorough investigation, and also the approval of the Committee on Mines and Mining of this House. I was surprised at the excitement manifested on the part of the several gentlemen who have taken part in the debate against this bill. They seemed to have discovered in it something which they say was wrong; but they have failed so far to explain to this House what that wrong consisted in.

Before proceeding to the discussion of this bill as it now stands, I desire to reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] the colleague of the gentleman who introduced the amendment to this bill, which has been incorporated into it. That gentleman was kind enough to warn the members of this House from the Pacific coast, as he said, of the fate of those members from that State who supported the Goat Island bill and who supported the Pacific mail subsidy in the Forty-second Congress. For the information of my friend from Pennsylvania, I will say that I as a member of the Forty-second Congress both advocated and voted for both of those measures. I returned to my home immediately after having voted in the Forty-second Congress for those two measures, and was renominated by acclamation for a seat in the Forty-third Congress. And notwithstanding the fact that by rearrangement of the congressional districts in my State, and the creation of a district which included my residence, which was largely democratic according to the vote cast at the last preceding election, I was elected to the Forty-third Congress by a majority exceeding that cast for any candidate for the Forty-third Congress in that canvass. The people of that State indorsed my action upon both of those measures by re-electing me in a district where there was a large democratic majority, notwithstanding the fact that I was slandered, maligned, and abused by a press in the interest of parties whose interest was against the interest of the people of that State. The democrats, recognizing the fact that I had stood up against that clamor and voted according to my own convictions of what was right, stood by me and re-elected me again triumphantly.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] betrayed in some remarks made by him a most woful ignorance of the condition of politics in the State of California—as much ignorance as he displayed in relation to the subject before the House. He knows as little of the politics of California as he knows of the interests of the poor miners, with whom he claims to have so much sympathy. I read a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois:

> Look at California, that State which is so rich in all that nature can bestow. To-day it is under the rule of the worst monopolies on this broad continent of ours. And so it is in Nevada. The dominant interest there is the interest of these monopolies. The men who come here and represent that country are honorable. All of them no doubt are honorable gentlemen, whom I respect and like. But it is just as natural that they should represent the dominant interest there as that I should represent the interest of my people.

I dare to say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois and for the information of this House, that I am not here in the interest of any monopoly. I am not here representing any particular interest. I am here representing, so far as the local interests of my State are concerned, the interests of my State; but so far as national questions are concerned I am here to represent, just as freely as any gentleman upon this floor, the interests of the whole people of the country according to my best judgment.

I am fully persuaded that there are a great many members of this House who are not familiar with the history of the previous legislation in relation to this Sutro tunnel, or they would not have given their support to the amendment which has been adopted by the House, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman have the kindness to state to the House his objections to my amendment, and wherein it differs from the first section of the bill reported from the committee?

Mr. HOUGHTON. Before I get through I will.

First, I desire to call the attention of the House to the provisions of the act of July 25, 1866, which lies at the foundation of whatever rights Mr. Sutro may have in this tunnel. That act grants to Mr. Sutro the right to construct a mining, draining, and exploring tunnel, and to sink mining, working, and air shafts along the line thereof to and beyond the Comstock lode, extending westerly from the initial point seven miles, more or less; the tunnel to be eight feet high and eight feet wide.

The right of way was to extend northerly and southerly on the course of said, lode either within the same, or east or west of the same, and also on or along any other lode which might be developed or discovered by said tunnel.

He was further granted the right to enter two sections of public land at the mouth of the tunnel.

He was further granted the right to purchase, at $500 per acre, all mineral veins and lodes within two thousand feet on each side of the tunnel, cut, discovered, or developed in constructing, through its entire extent, with all the dips, spurs, and angles of such lodes.

The bill excepted from its operation the Comstock lode, and all lodes within said two thousand feet which were at the passage of the act in the actual bona fide possession of other persons; all except the Comstock lode being withheld from sale by the United States, and subjected to the sole right of purchase by Sutro, if abandoned by their possessors, or not marked in conformity to the mining laws.

Section 3, subjects all claims or mines on the Comstock lode, as well as all other lodes drained, benefited, or developed by the tunnel, to the condition (to be expressed in any grant thereof made by the United States) to pay the owners of the tunnel the same rate of charges for drainage, &c., as had been or might thereafter be named in an agreement between such owners and the companies representing a majority of the estimated value of said Comstock lode at the time of the passage of the act.

Gentlemen here have said a great deal about monopolies. They have said that this bill as it came to this House from the Senate was in the interest of a monopoly; but no gentleman, so far as I have heard, has shown that fact. It rests simply on the assertion of these gentlemen. They have no knowledge upon this subject, I undertake to say, except that derived from the statements of Mr. Sutro himself.

Mr. NEGLEY. I beg to correct the gentleman. All the information that I have, which I rely upon on this floor, is derived from the statements of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] when he was a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and we examined this subject.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Sutro has been very diligent in presenting his claim, and asserting what he claims to be his rights in the matter of this tunnel. He is very industrious; he is very shrewd; he is very skillful in persuading gentlemen that his representations alone are true; that he alone is disinterested, and that everybody else who has anything to do with originating any legislation touching mining matters in the State of Nevada is an enemy to the poor miners of Nevada, and is acting in the interest of the Bank of California, which he has been holding up here before the House for years, as the bull-fighter holds a red flag before the bull, asking the House to dash at it blindly while he gets through some scheme in his own interest and in the interest of his associates in this matter. To show the feeling on the Pacific coast in relation to this question, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an extract from the Sacramento Record of very recent date.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Adolph Sutro's tunnel project, after being first lauded and then execrated, is gradually coming to be regarded as one of the most deep-laid, ingenious, and dangerous swindles ever conceived in the brain of a subtle adventurer. This tunnel, in fact, is neither more nor less than a scheme to secure the control of the whole of the Comstock lode; a plan to bleed every mine-owner on the lode, and establish a monopoly which it is already clear will be of no possible use to anybody but the owners of the tunnel.

Mr. HOUGHTON. At first it was supposed that this tunnel might be of some benefit, and those working mines upon this Comstock lode, believing that Mr. Sutro was in earnest, and that he would proceed and prosecute the work of constructing this tunnel in time to make it beneficial to them, or within such time as that it might benefit them, a majority of them entered into an agreement with Mr. Sutro by which they agreed to pay him two dollars per ton for all the minerals which should be extracted from their respective mines. Mr. Sutro bound himself by that contract to do certain things, and to do them within a given time. It is a conceded fact that Mr. Sutro has not complied with his contract.

Mr. Sutro himself, in the pamphlet which he has spread upon the desks of members, admits that he has not complied with the contract on his part. I read what he says from page 8 of that pamphlet:

> Should the question ever get into law, the courts will never decide that the contracts have been forfeited. The only point which can be made is that the work was commenced a year too late. In the face of the fact that every possible obstacle was thrown in the way, that plea will have but little weight, when it is considered that time was not the essence of the contract.

Time was the essence of the contract. Time was the only essential thing in it so far as the miners were concerned. They were sinking shafts upon their respective claims, and Sutro was constructing the tunnel at a great depth below their workings horizontally. It was supposed that as work progressed in sinking their shafts the accumulation of water would be so great that, if this tunnel was constructed to or beyond them, it would save the miners a vast amount of money, not only in the matter of draining their mines by avoiding the necessity of pumping and hoisting the water, but would also enable them to get their ore out of their mines without expensive machinery to raise it to the surface. But by reason of the delay of Mr. Sutro in prosecuting this work many of these mines have been sunk below the level of the tunnel, so that it is impossible that they should derive any benefit whatever from it in that respect, as they are all below the level of his tunnel. The miners claim that now by reason of his failure to comply with his contract they are absolved from their obligations under it. That is a question of controversy between these parties now, and I am informed it is before the courts for settlement. It seems to me it would be highly improper for Congress now to pass an act which would have the effect of binding these parties to the contract, notwithstanding the fact that Sutro by reason of his failure has released them from it, and when in all human probability the courts would adjudge that so far as they were concerned the contract was null and void.

There is another objection to this bill as it now stands. It is proposed to nullify and set aside the patents which have already been issued by the United States, upon the plea that some of these mine-owners who are engaged in this contest with Sutro refused to take out their patents. I suppose it is not necessary for me to say to any member of this House that where a patent for land has once been issued by the Government of the United States, through its proper officers and in pursuance of a law of Congress, it is not in the power of Congress to defeat the title of the party under that patent. It is said that the Government is receiving no money, because the parties refuse to take their patents. Gentlemen who make that statement seem to be very ignorant of the process of acquiring title to lands from the Government of the United States. No patent is ever issued until the money is paid. Gentlemen seem to think that Congress has control of this matter still; but that is a very grave error.

Whenever a patent is issued in the manner in which I have specified, whether it reaches the party named in it as grantee or not, it vests the title in him. Gentlemen say that these patents cannot be found, that they have not been filed, that receipts for patents cannot be found in the Land Office. That makes no difference whatever; that affects no one's rights. Every patent, before it goes away from the General Land Office, is recorded; and an exemplification of the record of any patent taken from the Land Office records has the same character and standing before any court of this country as the original patent. And the party is not required even to account for the non-production of the original, when he produces a properly certified copy of the record of the General Land Office. If this bill should pass in its present shape its effect would simply be that these parties would be deprived of ascertaining their rights in the courts of their country.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I ask for five minutes longer.

I say if this should become a law it would deprive these mine-owners of the right to assert their rights before the courts of the country, or force them to yield their rights in favor of Sutro.

Mr. Sutro professes a great sympathy for the poor miner, as he says. I do not believe in all these expressions of sympathy from Mr. Sutro for poor miners. Mr. Sutro is a wily schemer, a man who for years and years has lived by his wits, who has lived and thriven upon the scheme of this tunnel which he proposed to construct. No man of his character can have any sympathy for the poor miner. His real purpose is not to serve the poor miner, but to serve himself. If this bill should become a law and any claim is forfeited under its provisions, no one but Mr. Sutro can acquire a title to it, because the act of 1866 gives him the sole right to purchase every mining claim upon that lode or within two thousand feet on each side of it, and all other lodes which may be cut by the tunnel.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I now yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. LUTTRELL.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not propose to detain the House to exceed five minutes. I was opposed to the passage of the original bill, and am opposed to the bill as amended, and hope it will not pass. I believe the bill is in the interest of a monopoly, that it is in the interest of a corporation, and that it is prejudicial to the interest of the hard-toiling miners of the Pacific slope.

Mr. NEGLEY. What monopoly, the Bank of California?

Mr. LUTTRELL. The Bank of California and this man Sutro occupy about the same relation as two burglars, one of whom has entered the house and the other stands watch; one comes out and yells "Stop thief," and the result is that both get around the corner and divide the spoil. Pass this bill, and the interests of the miners will be crushed out between these two monopolies. This man Sutro has charged that the California delegation are working in the interests of the California Bank. So far as I am concerned, I deny it in toto. I hold my seat on this floor by reason of my opposition to all monopolies. I was elected in a district where General Grant received five thousand majority by a majority of twelve hundred and fifty. Why? Because I fought the Bank of California, and railroad rings, and land grants, and all other rings and monopolies.

Mr. NEGLEY. Was not this bill framed by a Senator from California and brought forward in this House by a Representative from California?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not represent the State of California in the Senate. I do not know who drew this bill; but I do know that every honest miner in the State of California is opposed to the passage of the bill. If the members of this House have any love for the workingmen of my section of country, I appeal to them to defeat every measure that comes up here proposing to force the honest miner to take out his patent before he has had an opportunity to work and develop his claim.

Mr. NEGLEY. Is there not such a requirement of law now?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir; and that law upon the statute-book is a curse to the miner. Why? I only call your attention for a moment to the Land Office report of 1873, by which it appears that in my State there were surveyed last year under the present law about three hundred mining claims. What is the operation of that law? In the first place, we had to deposit nearly $15,000 with the surveyor-general at the time of our applications before we could have our claims surveyed. How does such a requirement affect the poor miner? There are on the Comstock lode hundreds and hundreds of miners working to open up their claims. They are poor laboring men. Three or four of them combine together, and two work for wages while, perhaps, two more go off prospecting.

Mr. NEGLEY. Does this bill affect such men?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEGLEY. O, no.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If the gentleman will let me get through, he can talk as long as he pleases. I have but five minutes. I can give dozens of instances such as I have mentioned, instances of men who own no mines, who have nothing but their honest toil to depend on, who by the expenditure of their muscle delve in the earth, and open up these claims. They form themselves into parties of four or five, and two go on working for wages, and contribute means weekly to assist the others who are engaged in prospecting and making improvements. You now undertake to require such men to take out patents in twelve months.

It requires from $800 to $1,000 to obtain patents to these claims. How is it possible for the poor hard-working miner, perhaps with a family of four or five depending upon him for support, to raise such an amount in so short a time? Their claims may not pay them more than living wages, and perhaps not so much, until all the improvements are made upon them.

What does it cost to acquire title to land under the present law? In the first instance, a man must place $500 worth of improvements upon his claim; then he must deposit with the surveyor-general from thirty-five to one hundred dollars, as I can show to your satisfaction has been done in some three hundred cases; in many instances $100 were paid, and the average was fifty dollars to a claim. Then the miner must go and make his contract with the deputy surveyor-general, who charges him $100 for surveying his claim of probably one acre and making a plat of the same. Then he must advertise in the public prints, which costs him from forty to one hundred dollars more. Then he must deposit with the land officer from twenty-five to fifty dollars in each case. Then he must pay a notary public some fifteen dollars. Then his personal expenses amount to from fifty to one hundred dollars. Thus he has paid out on an average, provided he meets with no litigation, eight hundred or a thousand dollars. Of that amount how much does the Government receive? Only two dollars and fifty cents, while the poor miner has been obliged to expend nearly $1,000, two-thirds of which go into the hands of officials, and then, if his claim proves a failure, the miner is bankrupt.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman is mistaken as to the requirements of the law.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is the law; and that will be the operation of this bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. In what way?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Because it continues in force the onerous provisions of the present law, and compels honest miners to take out their patents before they have developed their claims.

How is it with the rich men? In one county in my district speculators have gobbled up twenty-two hundred and fifty acres of the best mining lands in one body, which is now owned by these speculators, and will be worked by cooly labor to the exclusion of the honest miner. How do they manage to acquire so much of this valuable land? I will tell you. They take $500 worth of hydraulic pipe, and lay it upon twenty acres, and then make affidavit that they have put so much improvements upon the land. The next day another one of the "ring" hauls that hydraulic pipe upon twenty other acres; then a similar affidavit is made; and so they will go on until they occupy the entire country. Those people are speculators. They are just such men as this man Sutro and the Bank of California.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. PAGE. If the House will extend the time, I shall have no objection to allowing the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. LUTTRELL. On three hundred claims, within the last year, the requirements of law have forced us to perform $162,500 worth of labor. As a further requirement, we have paid in cash about $113,750, making an aggregate of $276,250 to acquire title to probably three hundred acres of land. Of this expenditure the Government received only $812.

Yet this man Sutro tells you that he is laboring here in the interests of the poor miner; that his heart beats in unison with the poor miner. Why, sir, he has about as much love for the poor miner as the devil has for holy water, [laughter;] and the California Bank ring is in with him in this nefarious business. When he comes and tells you that the California delegation represent the California Bank ring, he knows that he tells a falsehood. He knows full well that if you undertake to force the miners on the Comstock lode to take out their patents, the result will be that the California Bank ring and Seligman & Co., whom this man represents, will gobble up the entire mining country, and crowd out the honest toiler and developer of American industry. I appeal to the honest men on this floor to reject this bill, and to repeal the oppressive requirements of the present law, so that the miner may be enabled to go upon the public domain, locate his claim, and work it for five years; and then, if he works it in good faith for that time, give him a patent for a homestead on the land. By this measure you will encourage the miner to prospect and develop the hidden treasures of our country, to add to the wealth of the nation, and to the prosperity and happiness of its people.

What, sir, has California done for our country? Why, sir, since the discovery of gold in California $990,000,000 have been taken from my State and added to the commerce of the world. The Comstock lode has added over two hundred millions, or about two-thirds of the entire silver product of the United States. The mines of our country have given millions of dollars to the support of the Government. When the country calls they obey her mandates. In the calls of charity their purses and hearts are always open. No nobler nor more self-sacrificing men breathe than the miners of the Pacific coast. When the late war was calling for help from all sections of our country I have seen them come from the mountains and hill-sides and give freely of their hard earnings for the support of the soldiers who were defending the country upon the field of battle. I will say to the gentleman [Mr. WARD] who represents the city of Chicago that when his beautiful city was laid in ashes these honest miners came down, as they have done on all like occasions, and willingly gave of the fruits of their labor for the relief of the people of that city. They are the most generous people upon the face of God's earth, and if you desire to protect them, and protect their interests, I appeal to you in their behalf to defeat this bill and kill everything of a kindred character. They do not want any such legislation, nor shall they have it if my humble efforts will prevent it.

If I had time I could furnish scores of documents to prove that the position I take is the correct one. The Sacramento Union, the San Francisco Bulletin, the Call, the Examiner, and the Post, and in fact every respectable journal in the State, inform us that no such legislation is needed. The only legislation which they ask for, or which they require, is that which will give these honest miners the right to their homesteads upon the mineral lands the same as you give to the farmer upon the agricultural lands.

The Bank of California and other kindred monopolies with which my State is cursed, have gobbled up in my county alone fifty thousand acres of our finest lands. They have taken up the lands from one end of the State to the other. They have monopolized the timber lands, swamp lands, agricultural lands, grazing lands, and now they seek to monopolize every acre of mining land in the State. I am opposed to any measure that will operate against any vested right of Mr. Sutro or the Bank of California, and will vote against any measure looking to that object. But while Mr. Sutro has rights, and the Bank of California also, yet the poor miners must not be imposed upon, nor their rights taken from them. I stand here to-day as the representative of the people—of the bone and sinew of our Government—and protest against this scheme to enrich powerful monopolies at the sacrifice of millions of poor men who develop our resources, who are the pioneers of civilization, and who add to the industries and prosperity of our nation.

Mr. PAGE. I cannot yield to my colleague any further, as I have promised to yield a portion of my hour to other gentlemen.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. PAGE. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for five minutes.

Mr. NEGLEY. Those who have been startled by the thunder of the gentleman's eloquence and by the cry of despair from the inhabitants of Virginia City will allow me to state that the telegram read this morning is incorrect. I hold in my hand a similar telegram addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which, let me state to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] the name of NEGLEY does not appear. I also hold in my hand an extract from a newspaper, the Territorial Enterprise, published on March 19, in which it is stated that "Congressman KENDALL has telegraphed the bill of JASPER D. WARD, of Illinois, will come up for consideration to-day;" and that convention, or rather that meeting which has been referred to, was a mass meeting called in reference to the Ward bill, and not at all in reference to this bill.

I further assert, Mr. Speaker, that the statement that all the miners are interested in opposing my amendment is untrue, for I have here a letter from a respectable miner of twenty-five years' experience, now residing in San Francisco, who states that my amendment is in the right direction, but that it should be made general and should not apply solely to the Comstock lode. I also hold in my hands telegrams from San Francisco saying that the Bank of California raised and controlled the meeting which was held last Saturday evening.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether those telegrams have not been got up to order by Mr. Sutro?

Mr. NEGLEY. No, sir.

Mr. HOUGHTON. That is his usual course of proceeding.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman has no right to stigmatize Mr. Sutro in that way. He is not on this floor to reply for himself, and I am not his advocate. I care nothing for Mr. Sutro. Every inspiration in his behalf, every word I have uttered here, has come from representations which have been made to me from his own State. All that I have done in his behalf has been justified by these representations and from the resolution passed in his favor by those who knew from experience the magnitude of his enterprise. I care nothing for Mr. Sutro. I have no interest in his mine. I have no interest in Nevada or California other than that I feel in the welfare of all the people of these States. But I do assure you, sir, that it is a "Heathen Chinee" game, this attempt to affect the judgment of this House by telegrams gotten up for the purpose of opposing the passage of an amendment introduced here in the interest of the Government and the vested rights of Mr. Sutro.

Mr. PAGE. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania say the telegram which was read from the Clerk's desk is a false one?

Mr. NEGLEY. No, sir; but I do say that the telegram read from the Speaker's desk is incorrect, and that the name of NEGLEY does not appear in the original.

Mr. KENDALL. I beg leave to say to gentlemen here that I have the original telegram in my desk, and that the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to wit, NEGLEY, does appear.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then the authors have not translated the proceedings correctly. I have here in my hands a telegram transmitted by the president and secretary of that meeting to the Speaker of this House, and I say that the name of NEGLEY does not appear in it at all.

But what is this telegram, after all, but rampage and nonsense. The absurd idea that we will take away from this people their rights, or deprive them of their homes and lands; that we will destroy the fruits of their labor, depreciate the value or lessen the production of their mines, or in any manner interfere with the industry of the poor miner, is a delusion and the solemn mockery of the truth.

The few corporations affected by the provisions of my amendment have reaped already, as stated by the gentleman, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] two hundred millions from their mines on the Comstock lode. Surely it is no hardship for them to perfect their titles and pay the paltry sum of $2.50 per acre.

My amendment only applies to the productive mines. It is not special or oppressive to a single miner on the Comstock lode, but touches those rich companies who are openly violating the law and transgressing the rights of others. This bill was prepared and introduced into this House by a Representative from California; and I hold the indorsement of the bill here in one of the papers published in Nevada. It was introduced into the Senate by a representative from California; and when gentlemen cannot pass the bill in the form dictated by their sagacity, they desire, they now ask you in the name of justice to repeal it. Justice to whom? It does not affect a single individual, but the seven or eight corporations owned or controlled by the Bank of California.

What is the occasion of this uproar, Mr. Speaker? Let me tell you. The Bank of California owns the railroad to Virginia City, and that road enjoys a monopoly of the transportation of all the passengers and freight carried to and from Virginia City. The same invincible power owns or controls all the reduction works near the Comstock lode, from which a profit of six dollars per ton is derived from all the ores obtained from these mines. The revenue derived from these two sources is simply enormous. But let the Sutro tunnel reach these mines two thousand feet below, and there will be competition, lower rates for transporting and reducing the ores, a greater security to life, and a richer field for the enterprise and labor of the poor miners.

Mr. PAGE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has only twelve and a half minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. PAGE. The debate has been running, I believe, by unanimous consent. The time of other gentlemen was extended, and I trust I will not be deprived of the opportunity of having ten or fifteen minutes to close debate.

The SPEAKER. That depends on the calling of the regular order, which comes up at half-past one o'clock.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the time has been extended, it has been extended for the benefit of gentlemen on the other side; and I hope that, as a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, I will have a few minutes more allowed me.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to any arrangement which will interfere with the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. That does not come up until half-past one o'clock.

The SPEAKER. But the hour for closing debate expires at fifteen minutes past one, and the voting will probably throw this question far beyond half-past one.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the House will, by unanimous consent, extend the time for debate until half-past one.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. PAGE. Then I can yield but five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

Mr. KENDALL. I hold in my hand the original telegram, and I desire to now contradict the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] that it does not contain his name. I have here the original, and I will read one sentence:

Very large meeting held to-night. Over two thousand voters present. Feeling against NEGLEY's amendment intense.

Mr. STORM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Nevada one question. Does he know that the New York papers publishing the telegram did not contain Mr. NEGLEY's name?

Mr. KENDALL. I do not care for what was in the New York papers; it does not matter; that telegram to the New York papers was a very incomplete summary of the one I have caused to be read.

Mr. STORM. The New York papers did not have it.

Mr. KENDALL. I am not responsible for the New York papers, I hope.

Mr. STORM. They may throw some light on the correctness of the telegram which has been read.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] has undertaken to enlighten us. I submit to gentlemen of this House that if they are really desirous of protecting the rights, the vested rights, of Mr. Sutro and the rights of all concerned they will table this bill.

Mr. COX. Make a motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. KENDALL. That we propose to do; and I hope my friend from New York will aid us in that motion. If the House will agree to lay the bill on the table the rights of all will be protected most certainly. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is serious in his wish to protect the rights of all let him vote with us and table this whole bill, including his amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which I have supported earnestly, because it did protect the vested rights of Mr. Sutro. I beg you to consider the resolutions and the earnest protest of the people affected by this bill as it is now amended. They surely understand their wants and know their own interests.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. KENDALL. I cannot yield to the gentleman. He is very eager to interrupt and interject his speeches into those of other gentlemen.

Now, I wish to put this plain, simple case by way of illustration. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has sought to champion the miners of my State, a section of the country which he has never seen. He has sought to enlighten this House with his knowledge about silver mining when he never saw a silver mine in his life, and would not know a silver mine if he did see it.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to correct the gentleman——

Mr. KENDALL. I do not yield.

Now, suppose that I, a Representative from the State of Nevada, solitary and alone, should undertake to champion some pet scheme of mine with parties outside at my back, something to affect an iron manufactory or an iron mine in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh, in the gentleman's district, in opposition to him, without consulting him, and in opposition to the entire delegation from his State, without consulting a single one of them, what would he think of me? Would there not be in my case, as there are in his case—he will pardon me for saying there may possibly be—some whispers, more or less loud, about the purity of motives? I say that the case supposed is his case here, the gentleman never having seen a silver mine.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KENDALL. I do not yield.

The gentleman never having seen a silver mine comes in here and attempts to enlighten the whole Pacific delegation about their business! Now, I ask the members of this House, in the name of honesty and fair play, and in justice to vested rights, to vote down this infamous amendment, which destroys the good effect of the whole bill, by tabling the bill itself.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania who offered this amendment, [Mr. NEGLEY,] and his colleague, [Mr. STORM,] who are so familiar with the condition and wants of the mines and miners of the Comstock, though neither has ever seen a silver mine, bray out their usual argument that this is another movement of the "California Bank ring" to defeat the long-suffering and much-persecuted Sutro!

Sir, I have opposed this amendment and intend to oppose it, because I believe and know it to be a monstrous wrong, because I believe and know it to be simply a spoliation of the rights of others. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] has labored hard and with his usual vehemence in attempting to show that I am inconsistent in my action. I can well afford to be indifferent to his labored effusion, to the scraps he has culled from speeches I have made here and elsewhere in which I have alluded to the Sutro tunnel. Why, I would gladly have aided him in his remarks, and would have found for his use language of mine still more strongly commending the Sutro-tunnel enterprise. Indeed, I said in the outset of this discussion, only the other day, these words:

I wish this enterprise of the Sutro tunnel to proceed. I have believed, and still believe, that it will do much to develop and encourage the mining interests of the West. I have been in favor, and am still in favor, of appropriate legislation in its aid. I repeat and reaffirm all that I have said in its favor. But I will not, if I know it, legislate for a controversy, for a suit pending.

And I said again on the same day:

And here I take occasion to repeat that I have been, and still am, friendly to the Sutro-tunnel enterprise. I have spoken in its behalf here and before the people in my State. I should rejoice to see it encouraged by Government aid. I will oppose, with all the force and influence I possess, any infringement on the rights of its projectors. Hence I will support a part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] And for the reason that I support the one, for that reason I oppose the other, The one protects vested rights; the other tramples them in the dust.

And I repeat again and again, if necessary, that I am friendly to this enterprise of Mr. Sutro; and have, certainly, no animosity toward him personally. I have tried to befriend his efforts. He is to me like any other man engaged in an undertaking having a public bearing—no more, no less. I have favored and still do favor the Sutro-tunnel enterprise by all legitimate means. But that, I hope and trust, does not compel me to support in its behalf a measure of confiscation of the rights of others. No, sir, I will not do this wrong to help on any enterprise, however commendable in itself that enterprise may be. I might be in favor of aiding my friend in building a house, but that would not argue that I should be in favor of furnishing him building material by pulling down the house of his neighbor. If, after all the debate that has been called out on his amendment, the gentleman shall be unable to reconcile my past declarations with my present opposition to this iniquity, it will be useless for me to say more. If he cannot see the difference between honestly encouraging the Sutro-tunnel project, and aiding its projectors to trample upon the rights of others, we will never understand each other upon this question. Argument will be lost upon him. He will never comprehend the distinction. Indeed, to use an expression not new, it will never enter his head except by a surgical operation.

This same proposition of compelling the miners on the Comstock lode to take out their patents, and by those patents binding themselves irrevocably to pay the royalty whether the tunnel shall be completed in the next five, or fifty, or five hundred years, was suggested to me two months ago, nearly, by Sutro himself. I at once declared my opposition to any such legislation; remonstrated with him upon its injustice to others and its imprudence; and I had supposed that the idea was abandoned until I found this amendment thrown suddenly into the House the other day. I regret this ill-advised action, because I clearly foresee in its effects the ruin of an enterprise that deserves well of the country. Mr. Sutro, unfortunately for himself, makes the grave mistake of supposing that his tunnel is the only interest in Nevada that should be represented in Congress. This hallucination is, perhaps, natural to him as an enthusiast in his project, but it is none the less damaging to himself and to his whole enterprise.

It is very easy to impugn motives. It is the only argument that a certain class of minds can make or understand. I am quite indifferent to such arguments, especially when advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY.] But the gentleman's ardor in championing his amendment has excited the inquiry all over this House why he, especially, should espouse a measure of this sort in opposition to the united wishes of all the Members and all the Delegates of this House from the Pacific mining States and Territories. I say, the question has been asked of me often since this debate began. I invariably answer, "Why, you see, NEGLEY is so familiar with the subject of mines and mining on the Comstock lode that it was the most natural thing in the world for him to undertake the defense of the poor miners out there. True, he never saw the country; but what does that matter? True, he never saw a silver mine, and would not know one if he should see it. True, he cannot tell us how mining claims in Nevada are located, held, worked, or carried on, and often confounds the strike of a lode with its dip, and imagines that the native silver is quarried out in blocks from those celebrated mines; but what of that, sir? He has lately put his intellect into this subject. He has suddenly aroused himself to the importance of special legislation for the miners of the Comstock. He has investigated their wants and knows just what they need—these old miners who have been delving away in the mountains of the West for the last fifteen or twenty years. You see, not every one is endowed with such comprehensive talent and statesmanship. If I, or if one of my colleagues from California, for instance, should spring upon and attempt to push through this House a measure vitally affecting, for example, a vast iron manufactory, or a valuable iron mine in the gentleman's district; if one of us should suddenly become enthusiastic and heroic over a pet measure of this sort in opposition to the wishes of the gentleman and in opposition to the wishes of his entire delegation; if one of us should, all at once, and under these circumstances, get inspiration and illumination about the gentleman's local affairs, that presumptuous individual would be voted a nuisance, a bore, and an intruder. He would be considered as speaking before he was requested and not in his turn. A western member, with his characteristic modesty, would, in the case I have supposed, think it due to himself, due to the gentleman, and due to his delegation and to their constituency, to consult in some degree his wishes and the wishes of his colleagues. If he and his entire delegation were found to be united in opposition, and if the California member or the Nevada member should still urge such a measure, about which he had no practical knowledge, we would not complain if there should be some whispers—more or less faint—about purity and disinterestedness of motives. But you must see that it is different with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] and his little piece of special legislation for our benefit—the amendment to this bill. He is a statesman of the most versatile talents, as we all know. His mind grasps the greatest questions and the minutest details of legislation equally well. He is at home in all questions arising in the East or in the farthest West.

> "Turn him to any cause of policy,
> The Gordian knot of it he will unloose
> Familiar as his garter.

"Such isthe gentleman from Pennsylvania. His example is not safe for ordinary men to imitate. He masters the details of mining on the Comstock and its relations to Congress all equally well. He touches nothing in legislation which he does not adorn by the marks of his wonderful genius."

And all this shallow, senseless talk about the "California Bank ring"—the attempt to rob Mr. Sutro of his vested rights! Ah, sir, it is the old trick and cry of "stop thief" by the culprit himself. Why, if you sincerely wish to protect everybody in their rights just as they are now under the law, table, kill the whole bill, amendments and all. Unless you wish to secure some new legislation, some unfair advantage for one of two parties now in court, you will do this.

I have been amazed at the bald assumption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in styling the simple and ordinary agreement of the miners on the Comstock to litigate, a controversy, a conspiracy to defeat Mr. Sutro of his vested rights by corrupting Congress! Does the gentleman expect to succeed by such assertions? Lately I saw it stated that one of these famous mines had declared a dividend of $200,000. Why does not the gentleman claim that this money, instead of going into the hands of stockholders, is to be used by the "bank ring" to buy votes here? Sir, the affidavit of Mr. Aron, which the gentleman had printed in his speech, but which he was prudent enough not to have read to the House, confirms what I have stated all along, that these parties are now in court; their rights are undergoing judicial examination; the very rights you would pass upon if you enact this bill into a law. And what more common thing, what more legitimate procedure, than for parties to subscribe to a fund to defray the expense of litigation? It is done every day. It is, as Mr. Webster once said, to the honor and glory of the American people and of the whole Anglo-Saxon race, that when a difference of opinion arose among them, they went to law about it. These people—these miners—differ in opinion from Mr. Sutro, and they propose to go to law about it. They have raised a fund for that purpose. They have made an agreement. They have subscribed money. That money is to be used in conformity with the following resolution, which Mr. Aron swears he has copied correctly from the record-book of the Ophir Gold and Silver Mining Company:

> Resolved, That the president and secretary of this company be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to make and execute in the name of this company a contract or agreement in accordance with the foregoing instrument, binding this company, in connection with other companies on the Comstock lode, to litigate the claim of the Sutro Tunnel Company to collect a royalty upon ores raised from mines of said companies or said Comstock lode.

There is the resolution. There is no concealment about it. It is spread upon the books of the company, and any one of the hundreds or thousands of stockholders may see it. The company say by this resolution that they propose an ordinary law-suit. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that they mean to corrupt Congress, and quotes the resolution as his proof! Are such statements to pass for arguments here? And yet upon such statements, such arguments, gentlemen would have this House decide and forestall a purely judicial question!

Sir, since when, even upon the clearest reasoning and upon the best argument, did this Congress become a judicial body? When this noisy assemblage of three hundred men resolves itself into a court to adjudicate nice legal questions in the light of the gentleman's fine legal arguments to which we have listened, then our law-books may as well be burned. The authorities which the gentleman will cite in the argument of his causes will be the elegantly gotten up literature of Mr. Sutro; a fancied pronunciamiento of the "bank ring," and liberal quotations from my own poor speeches to convict me of inconsistency.

I had, Mr. Speaker, at one time thought of replying to the other gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] usually so reticent, who the other day became so suddenly enlightened about the wants of the poor miners in the "sage-brush;" but I forbear; it is not worth the while; it is not of the slightest consequence. But, sir, as showing the feeling that everywhere exists in my State touching this amendment, I shall call the attention of the House to articles which came to me in the newspapers since this bill has been under discussion.

The Eureka Sentinel, published in a great mining center of the State, speaks of this amendment in connection with the bill introduced recently by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.] The difference between the bill introduced by this gentleman and the amendment which we oppose now is, that the first is general in its application, while the latter is local to the Comstock lode alone. The newspaper to which I have referred says:

> The distinguishing feature of WARD's bill, it will remembered, is the clause compelling corporations or individuals to take out United States patents for their mines within six months from the date of its passage. This would virtually force the poor prospector to pay the Government for his claim before knowing whether or not it was worth the purchase-money. A greater outrage in the shape of mining legislation was never attempted in or out of Congress; and we shall hope to learn when the news comes along that it was effectually squelched. WARD, the author of the bill, hails from Chicago. He would perhaps do full as well to give his attention to matters with which he is familiar. He may know all about pea-nuts and putty, or buckwheat and squashes, but he is not good authority on mines and mining; and it is the height of presumption on his part to meddle with a subject of such vast importance to the people of the whole Union.

I quote at length the following article from the Evening News of the 24th March. This paper is published at Gold Hill, immediately upon the Comstock lode. The article comprises a statement of this controversy:

> In referring to the recent appearance of Sutro in the lobby of the House of Representatives at Washington, his procurement of the introduction of certain amendments, which if adopted would force every prospecting company upon the Comstock lode to make application for patents to their lands within six months from the passage of the act or perfect their claims, and which amendments also had the effect to render each application thus made and every patent granted thereunder subject to the infamous lien of Sutro's so-called royalty, we expressed the opinion that there was something behind all this which was not yet apparent. It now comes out in special dispatches from Washington. Sutro had a paper offered by his seeming attorney, Mr. NEGLEY, in the House, which explains his zealous efforts to so hedge up the way of procuring patents that none can be obtained without impliedly or actually consenting to the lien of royalty imposed by the Sutro-tunnel act. It may here be remarked that unless the law is unconstitutional, this is the case now. But here is what Sutro says:
> Many have made application but have purposely neglected to take any further steps to perfect their titles, while others have received their patents. But it can no longer be shown that they have formally accepted them, for the only evidence to that effect—the duplicate receipts given—have been stolen from the register's office at Carson, and the register in the office at the time has disappeared. Section 1 of Senate bill No. 16, referring to mining claims for which patents have been applied for and the proof not perfected in one year, provides that in default of which the proceedings for patents so had by such applicants shall be considered void and without effect.
> First. To allow of the acceptance of the terms of the Sutro-tunnel act, implied by an application for patents, to become void by the law so that it shall no longer be evidence of such implied acceptance.
> Secondly. To allow not only the application, but all the proceedings for patent so held by such applicants to become void and without effect, which might be construed to make void also the claims for patents already issued, especially in those cases where the duplicate receipts have been stolen.
> Thirdly. To enable the parties to speedily secure a new patent without the Sutro-tunnel clause, should they toward the end of the session succeed in smuggling in a repeal of the Sutro-tunnel act also at such late hour that Congress could not correct the occurrence before another session.
> Fourthly. Allow them a new application for a patent to enlarge and float the boundaries of their claims further east, in order to cover the country in which the late developments give every reason to suppose that the Sutro tunnel will make large and independent discoveries of lodes.
> Another amendment to Senate bill No. 16 should be offered: That such mines on the Comstock lode shall be open to relocation for which patents are not applied for within six months and the title perfected within six months additional, would have that effect, and would at the same time secure to the Government the price of the land which had been withheld from it a number of years.
> It appears from these statements—
> First. That most of the mining companies on the Comstock lode which had made application for patent have refused to perfect the same, owing to the fact that they would, while the present law authorizing the Sutro tunnel stands on the books, be forced to take their patent subject to the royalty clause.
> Secondly. That many more have refused to make application since the passage of this bill, because by so doing they impliedly agreed to the conditions of the tunnel act.
> Thirdly. That to avoid any connection with or to keep clear from any obligation arising out of the Sutro-tunnel act, with its accompanying incubus, the two-dollar royalty clause, those mines which have applied for patents have allowed said applications to become void, choosing rather to take chances on holding their ground until hereafter they might procure an unincumbered patent therefor, rather than to take it from the Government subject to the eternal incumbrance of the royalty robbery.
> Whether or not these allegations of Sutro are true, we are not informed; doubtless to some extent they are. What do they show, and what does Sutro want? They show that so great is the opposition to the Sutro-tunnel scheme, and the law under which it proposes to force the whole Comstock lode to pay tribute to the owners of its franchise, that the companies, prefer to rest upon the uncertain tenure of a simple claim to mining ground rather than take a patent from the Government subject to the provisions of the tunnel act. They also show that in the opinion of all the mining companies upon this lode, instead of being of value, the Sutro tunnel is of little account, and that the benefits to be derived from its completion are not at all commensurate with the amount of tribute to be exacted from producing mines upon the lode. They further prove what we have heretofore maintained, that the Government has thus far lost the sale of over two hundred mining patents, and that this infamous law stands to-day as a bar between the Government and the mining companies—between its interests and those of the miners upon the Comstock lode. We say that by Sutro's own statements it is shown that for years this law has acted as a drag upon our mines and as a hinderance to the Government in disposing of its lands in this vicinity.
> Now what does Sutro ask? He wants a mining law so framed as to compel the mining companies on this lode to take their patents subject to his tax or otherwise forfeit their claims. He asks that a law be passed declaring all mines on the Comstock open to relocation unless patents are applied for within six months, and the title perfected within six months thereafter. In other words, he demands the passage of a law which will drive every prospector in this section into making application for a patent to his claim within six months, (bear in mind that the moment such application is made the applicant impliedly accepts the terms of Sutro's act,) and which compels the prospector within six months thereafter to prove up title, pay for his claim, and take his patent, subject to the tunnel law. This would effectually vest the right in Sutro to tax the proceeds of each and every claim so proved and paid for forever to the amount of two dollars per ton of ore thereafter extracted.

It is infamous, and the hardihood of the ring which, under authority of national law, thus seeks to harass and rob the miners of this section has no parallel. We repeat that this is the most infernal attempt ever made to force unwilling victims into the toils of a combination which, without rendering any benefit, proposes to suck wealth unlimited from our mines and miners. Sutro fears that his bill will be repealed. His trepidation is well founded, for it will. He now seeks to hasten the procurement of patents before the repeal of his franchise, because by so doing the patents thus obtained would be issued subject to the conditions of the now existing law, a repeal of which thereafter would fail to invalidate the right to claim royalty of all whose patents had been obtained prior thereto. The Congress of these United States has passed many laws in the interest of rings, but we boldly assert that none have been enacted which in injustice, yea, villainous plundering, at all approach the law now under discussion, should the amendments demanded by Sutro be made a part thereof.

Another article from the Virginia Evening Chronicle of the 23d instant. I omit paragraphs which—so intense is the feeling there—are more of a personal nature; for with such matters I have nothing to do here:

Unfortunately for the welfare of the mining interests of the Pacific States, Congressmen who know very little about mining and far less about the interests involved therein are constantly frightening the country by the introduction of impracticable and dangerous mining bills. The "Ward bill," so recently the subject of congressional and journalistic discussion, properly belonged to the category of "dangerous," but the bill met with such general popular disfavor that hopes are entertained that it will die in the hands of the Committee on Mines and Mining. The other day the Senate passed a bill, the objects of which are twofold: first, to hasten proceedings in obtaining patents to mineral lands; and secondly, to prevent speculators from filing bogus applications upon such lands. The bill requires that final proof shall be made by applicants within one year, in default of which, unless there shall be an adverse claimant, all the proceedings shall be declared null and void.

When the bill came before the House of Representatives on Wednesday last, Sutro and his lawyers appeared in force fully armed with a list of amendments to the Senate bill. It is needless to state that these amendments were all for the benefit of the Sutro Tunnel Company. Their entire gist and aim is to reaffirm Sutro's right to extort the royalty of two dollars on every ton of ore whichshall ever be lifted from the Comstock mines after the completion of the tunnel. By some hocus-pocus, Sutro induced HOLMAN of Indiana and NEGLEY of Pennsylvania to introduce his amendments, and the fight began on Thursday last. Mr. PAGE, of California, opposed the amendments on the ground "that they virtually declare that no bill relating to mineral lands should be passed unless Sutro were permitted to make it subservient to the Sutro tunnel." Mr. KENDALL, of Nevada, also vigorously opposed the amendments, and instead of the amendment offered by HOLMAN on Wednesday, offered the following substitute:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal or in any way affect the provisions of an act granting A. Sutro the right of way and other privileges used in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel to the Comstock lode."

Mr. PAGE was satisfied with the substitute, but it did not suit the fastidious tastes of Adolph and his attorneys, and therefore the matter is still in hand.

Now, in the name of common sense, what is the necessity of those amendments and of all this congressional twaddle about the Sutro franchise? The law as it now exists is a sufficient guarantee to the tunnel company, provided they accomplish what they agreed to perform when the franchise was granted, and nobody questions the fact.

If you do not mean positive legislation in behalf and in favor of Mr. Sutro you will join us in voting to table the bill. I protest against its passage with this amendment in the name of the people of all classes in the vicinity of the Comstock mines, who would be ruinously affected by such a measure, who have remonstrated against this great wrong that is threatened.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything to what has already been said to induce the members of this House to vote down this amendment. It may be proper, however, for me to refer briefly to the history of Mr. Sutro in connection with this Sutro tunnel.

It appears that in 1865 Mr. Sutro obtained a charter from the State of Nevada to construct this tunnel. He immediately went to mine-owners upon the Comstock and adjoining lodes and entered into a contract with a few of the mine-owners on the Comstock and adjoining lodes, providing that when the tunnel was completed the parties who used it should pay him two dollars a ton royalty upon all the ore passing through it. Mr. Sutro agreed with these miners that he would get $3,000,000 subscribed to his tunnel, and that he would commence the work and expend from the 1st day of August, 1867, the sum of $400,000 per annum until it was completed. What did he do? Instead of going on and raising the money as a man would have done who meant to do what he had agreed to do, on the pretense that he was going to Europe to obtain the money, he came to Congress and got the act of 1866 passed, whereby he compelled not only those who had entered into this contract, but all those who had refused to enter into it, to pay this two dollars a ton royalty, whether they used the tunnel or not. That is the law. It also provided that when patents were taken out, when miners obtained Government title, that Government title should be subject to the two dollars a ton royalty given to Mr. Sutro. I say he succeeded in getting the law of 1866 passed; but what are the facts of the case? Why does he not ask, and why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania ask, to have this law apply to all the mines which the Sutro tunnel will touch in its construction? Why, simply because the Government has withdrawn from public entry two thousand feet on each side of the Comstock lode of the most valuable mineral lands in the State of Nevada, in the interest of Mr. Sutro. Whenever a miner owning a mine within two thousand feet on each side of the proposed tunnel shall abandon his claim or fail to comply with the mining laws, then it falls to Mr. Sutro, and I say that they propose by this bill to compel the miners on the Comstock lode to take out patents, while they say to those alongside of the tunnel, "You shall not take out patents." This is an evident act of injustice, which I hope the House will not sanction.

Well, now, what has been the policy of the Government? Why, sir, the first mining law, the law of 1866, declared all of these lands containing mineral ore to be open to exploration. That is what Congress declared in 1866. In other words, they said to every miner, "If you will expend $1,000 on your mine and hold it subject to the local mining laws, you shall have a possessory right to that mine." It was a bona fide contract entered into between the Government and the miners; but gentlemen now seek to change this and to say to these miners who have expended on their mines and have complied with all the mining rules and regulations that they must take out their patents within six months or forfeit their claims.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the manifesto of Mr. Sutro himself, and I want to call the attention of the House to the compliment he has paid to the Senate, the highest legislative body in the United States; I want to call the attention of the House to the compliment that he has paid to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the Senate. I refer to the senior Senator from Maine, Mr. HAMLIN, a man who has been elevated by the voice of the American people to the second office in their gift. What does he say in reference to the bill that was examined by the Committee on Mines and Mining of the Senate, unanimously reported and passed by the Senate? He says:

Senate bill 16, containing a provision concocted with satanic ingenuity, passed the Senate while these parties knew I was absent in Europe. It was intended as the assassin's stab in the dark.

The distinguished foreigner—for I am informed that he is not an American citizen—comes here and lays upon the desks of the members of this House a vile libel upon men as honorable as ever occupied seats in any legislative assembly in this world.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I hope the House will extend my time a few minutes.

Mr. NEGLEY. I shall object unless my time be extended too.

Mr. PAGE. I will occupy only six minutes, if the House will allow me, and then yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from California?

Mr. KELLEY. I should like to say a few words on this subject myself.

Mr. CREAMER. I object.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection; I desire to finish my remarks.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will agree that the gentleman's time shall be extended if he will permit my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] to speak for five minutes.

Mr. HUBBELL. I would like to have five minutes on this question, if the House will grant it to me.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to further debate, the question is upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. KENDALL. I appeal to every friend of the miner to table this bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is closed.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 76.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. PAGE and Mr. LUTTRELL called for the yeas and nays.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1930) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land in the White-Earth reservation in Minnesota on which are situated their church and other buildings.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House now resumes the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. Mr. CREAMER. I move that gentlemen who desire to speak further upon this question have leave to print their speeches in the RECORD, and that to-morrow at two o'clock the House proceed to vote upon this bill. Further delay by speech-making is a waste of time.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. CREAMER] has wasted much time in that way.

Mr. CREAMER. Every speech that is made here costs the country at least $1,000,000 by delaying action, and no one listens to those speeches. We have been here four months and have come to no conclusion on this subject.

Mr. BECK. I desire to be heard upon this subject, and I object to the proposition of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The House proceeds to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, we are bound to give the people of these United States a sound currency. We are bound to give them specie payments; for only gold, or a credit based on gold, is a sound currency. We are bound, whether we be liberals, republicans, or democrats, by express promise; we are bound by the provisions of a law, the first ever signed by our Chief Magistrate; we are bound by the oath we took as members of this House to support the Constitution; we are bound by the conventions of Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and Baltimore, which pledged the three great parties to "speedy resumption;" we are bound by the act of March, 1869, which "solemnly pledged the public faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin;" we are bound by the Constitution, which was formed "to promote the general welfare." Can we better provide for the general welfare than by giving to the people a uniform, stable currency?

For the general welfare, for the interests of other classes, others may speak. Let me to-day speak for the interests of labor—the labor of the farm and of the shop—

FOR THE POOR MAN.

I believe, and I think I can show, that while the moral evils resulting from a depreciated currency fall uniformly, the material ill, the real suffering and loss, fall upon the laborer and the farmer. The capitalist and merchant, in the resources of varied exchanges and varied investments, may adjust and shift the loss; the poor man receives it all. Wall street, and Beacon street, and Chestnut street may escape; the farm and the workshop, never. Therefore I urge to-day the resumption of specie payments in the name of the farmer and mechanic.

I ask a sound currency for those whose plows rust in the furrow; for those who darken the streets of Paterson with their patient waitings.

I SPEAK FOR MY OWN PEOPLE.

And let no man smile that I speak for those whose wants I best know and most feel: I speak for them, not to them. Shall I tell them of sufferings they have felt? Shall I point them to the silent forge, and spindle, and loom? They have lived and moved among them all this dreary winter, as men can live and move, even among the silent monuments of departed life. They ask for a sound currency; as their representative, I ask for it in their name. They have waited, they are still waiting, with patience. So far, they have asked for bread, and their Government has given them a stone; they have asked for money, their Government has given them a rag.

Mr. Speaker, a century ago, a part of the English people gathered around Westminster Hall to impress a sentimental grievance upon their representatives. Their subsequent conduct was not such as the friends of order could approve. Not such would be the conduct of the Paterson mechanics, should they gather around this Capitol to impress their real grievances. There would be no noise, no disorder, no riot. They would stand the livelong day in patient waiting. They would part without threat, to let in and out the representatives of the people, and as each passed, they would simply say, "You believe the testimony of Jefferson, Jackson, and Benton; or, you believe the testimony of Adams, Clay, Webster, and Sumner. Give us the money they recommended; give us a dollar that is a dollar. Give us the money of our fathers; give us the money of the world."

Mr. Speaker, I could spend much time in proving financial truths that were never disputed before this year of our Lord. Why should I? Shall I put up a man of straw, to knock him down? Shall I tell truths that the theory and experience of the world have established? Can I write them better than Smith, Ricardo, Say, Rice, and Bagehot? Can I speak them better than Jefferson, and Benton, and Webster, and Clay? If there is a man who believes there is any other basis for a sound currency than gold, and who maintains that belief in the face of the world's testimony, and the world's experience, I cannot convert him; I will not attempt it.

It seems to me that most of the confusion of thought and expression that appears in this discussion is the result of

INACCURACY OF TERMS.

The words are used in an inaccurate fashion. That the confusion is one, not in the subject, not in the mind that grasps it, but in the terminology. Give that strict definition to terms, give that strict use of terms when defined, which rules in other sciences, and all confusion must give way to order and harmony. In the great process of exchange there are two parts, two functions. For these two functions two different instruments are needed. Let us give these different instruments different names, and carefully maintain the distinction.

WHAT IS MONEY?

It is the measure of value. It is the instrument devised to transact the first step in an exchange. It is the commodity used to estimate the relative value of other commodities.

Before we can exchange commodities we must know what is their real value. We must take a commodity of fixed value, and dividing it into units, make these represent the ratio which other commodities bear to each other. This measure of value is money.

THIS MEASURE OF VALUE IS GOLD.

Why? Because gold has the mechanical qualities for such a measure. It is divisible and indestructible. It has, too, a universal and stable value. Now money must have value, because it is used to measure value. If we wished to measure the length of commodities we should take a measure that had length. Did we wish to measure weight, we would take as a measure a commodity that had weight. So when we measure values we must have a measure that has value. And gold is the only article that has a universal and stable value. Universal, for here civilization and barbarism, the past and the present, meet. Abraham counted shekels in the first recorded bargain, and William exacted from France a coin subsidy. The Pacific islander clamors for gold; and for gold the poet laureate of Great Britain sells his muse. "But," says an objector, "have not other commodities a universal value? How with wheat? Abraham gathered wheat before shekels. Glidden's mummy unfolded wheat mixed with gold, and your islander sometimes says 'wheat' first, 'gold' afterward." All of which is true. But the demand for wheat is finite, and can be supplied. When supplied the price falls, for there is a glut. Not so with gold. The demand is infinite; there can be no glut. It grows on what it feeds. The Incas, when their eyes were dazzled with its ubiquitous sheen, schemed for it; and our richest grangers—most virtuous of men—are still Olivers, asking for more. And gold has a stable value; not perfectly so, (for I have heard of California and Australia,) but more stable than any other commodity. Hence for our money, for our measure of value, we take gold.

But besides money we hear of currency. What is that? Money was the measure of value.

WHAT IS CURRENCY?

Currency is the medium of exchange. It is the instrument that performs the second process in exchange. After money has fixed the relative values of commodities, currency makes the exchange. And what is currency? What does it consist of?

Mainly of credit. Credit in one of its many forms, draft and note, bill and check and account. So we have two different instruments, and two sets of names for them; one set is, the measure of value—gold, money; the other is, the medium of exchange—paper credit, currency.

And here is the only opportunity for mistake in keeping this distinction. Money is the measure of value—is gold. Currency is the medium of exchange—is paper representing gold. But as a principal can do what its representative can— money, gold, can also discharge the second process of exchange, can also be currency. It can perform the two functions. But when money performs the second function, makes the exchange, it is currency. Hence a deal of confusion. From this we escape by bearing always in mind that while money is currency, currency, except the small part which is gold, is not money. And perhaps just here it is well to say that no bullionist, no hard-money man, as far as I know, wants to use gold for currency. We want to use gold for money, for the measure of values. We want to use paper as currency, as the medium of exchange. In other words, we think gold the best measure of value; paper the best instrument of exchange, the best currency. But it must be paper that represents value, that represents gold, and can be turned into it. Why, then, are we dissatisfied with our present currency, which is paper? For the reason that it is not real currency, it does not represent value. It was not born, it was made.

WHAT IS THE ORIGIN OF A SOUND CURRENCY?

How does it get its birth? It is born in some transaction, and represents some value, money or property, which the transaction concerned. This is truest of the lowest and highest forms of credit. Take the earliest conception of currency. It is in the very infancy of trade before money is yet used as a measure of value. My friend has a skiff on the Hudson; I have a skiff on the Potomac. We wish to exchange. My friend takes my skiff. He gives me a writing which empowers the bearer to take his. This writing is the simplest form of credit, the first piece of currency. And in the market any man who wants the skiff, or knows the value of it, will accept it as currency. This draft was born in a transaction—the exchange of skiffs; and represents value—property, the Hudson skiff, which exists to redeem it.

Take a step further in the development of currency. Money is now used as a measure of value, and exchanges are to that degree simplified. My friend this time wishes to buy my house. We fix the price. He has no money, but I trust him. He gives me a written promise to pay. Here is another form of credit. I walk off with another kind of currency—

THE PROMISSORY NOTE.

This note, too, was born in a transaction—the purchase and sale of the house. And the note, too, represents property, value; for it represents the house which my friend owns, and which still exists as a means of payment. If my friend, when the note falls due, has the house, he can by sale or mortgage, pay it. But suppose my friend has sold the house before the note falls due. If he sold it, he sold it for something—money or currency or property—and he holds the money or draft or property in place of the house and the representative of his note, and ready for its redemption. Just as the skiff stood behind the draft, the house stands behind the note.

But before my friend's note fell due, I needed a still higher kind of currency, one capable of wider circulation. Strangers refuse it; so I go to my bank. The bank will discount if I will take the bank's promise. The bank's promise passes as money; so I take it. This time I go out with another form of credit—another kind of currency—

THE BANK-NOTE.

This bank bill came into being in a transaction, and represents value—the house of my friend, which still stands ready to furnish the money to pay the note, which pays the bank-bill.

So under natural laws currency in all forms comes into the volume of circulation, as the result of transactions, as the representative of value. Its volume, therefore, regulates itself. There is as much as there are transactions, as there are values, and no more.

But there comes a

DISTURBING ELEMENT.

The Government injects it into this natural stream fed by the business of the country. Government issues its promises, not as the representative of gold, not as the representative of property, but as the representative of debt. Natural currency comes as the representative of wealth—the Government currency as the representative of poverty.

Why, then, do not the laws of trade eject it, this foreign element—this bastard currency? They would. Men would refuse to take it. Nature would cure herself. But supreme sovereignty interferes and forces it upon the people. The people submit because they are law-abiding.

"But," says the friend of the greenback, "you argue as if the Government gave away its currency. This is not true. The Government received value for it." Certainly the Government did. It received property for its notes; but the property was bought for consumption or destruction. The property immediately upon its transfer ceased to exist as the means for paying the notes. If I sold a citizen a cargo of grain and he gave me his note for it, the cargo of grain in his hands, or some one else's, exists as the means of paying it. If I sell the cargo to the Government and take its note, the Government takes the grain and distributes the grain among its soldiers, and it is consumed, and no grain is left to pay the notes, nor can it be sold to furnish other means of paying them. In the case of the Government the property perished, leaving the notes unprotected. In the case of the private note the property remained to produce the means for payment. This examination of the nature of credit, of the origin of currency, SHOWS ITS PROPER LIMITS.

Credit can act beneficently till it reaches the consumer; there it should stop. Bankers and merchants are simply agents for the exchange of commodities, and as such they may safely promise to pay with merchandise in existence, not for their own consumption, but for sale; and thus they may conduct their operations forever, without failure, through the various degrees of subdivision until the actual consumer is reached through the retail dealer. Here the point is reached where credit is most pernicious and should be avoided. The promises issued by the consumer, whether it be the Government or the laborer, are not from their nature currency, and any effort to force their circulation produces only confusion and loss. But this is what our Government did when, in the stress of war, it issued its promises against property, which it consumed or destroyed. Hence came the greenback; fruitful source of all our woes. This increased the currency beyond its natural limits. It was in excess. There was more currency than there was property for it to represent, and

THERE WAS A DEPRECIATION.

Let me not waste time to chronicle the now familiar effects of a depreciated and irredeemable currency. It is always in excess. This excess stimulates extravagance and speculation. There is constant temptation to be rid of a currency whose value is uncertain. Use it now, it is worth something; retain it until to-morrow, it may be worth nothing. And so the spirit of the gambler enters into the heart of the nation, and after extravagance come speculation, crime, moral and material ruin. To chronicle what of this moral and material ruin is general, I do not pause. I pass this to show that the worst evils of an unsound currency fall upon the poor.

The harm of wrong legislation in finance, as in taxation, falls and rests at last upon them. As a direct consequence of depreciated money, prices fluctuate, so the man who buys cannot tell for what he will sell, or what his money will be worth when he gets his pay. Against this uncertainty the rich man who sells can insure himself by adding a percentage to his price. The poor man who buys, buys to consume not to sell again, and pays this percentage out of his poverty. The rich man adds to the price of his commodities the premium on gold at each rise, and by continual exchanges adjusts or shifts the loss. The poor man has but one thing to exchange—his labor—and does not know the hourly, daily, or weekly rise of gold; and does he, he cannot daily, hourly, weekly, or even monthly add it to his wages. He cannot readily make new contracts for his labor, and, unfortunately, it is the only contract he can ever make. So the premium on gold reaches his wages last of all.

Certainly, then, an

IRREDEEMABLE CURRENCY IS NOT FOR THE POOR MAN.

If it is for the benefit of any, it is for the rich man and for the speculator. The more rich the man, the more desperate the speculator, the more easily he avoids the losses; the more certainly he profits by the fluctuations. Increase the number and variety of transactions, and you increase the opportunities to adjust or shift the burdens of a fluctuating currency. The poor man, who has nothing to sell but his labor, and who has everything to buy—lodging, food, clothing—finds his labor receiving only the premium on gold. This is bad for him at one end, and it is equally bad at the other; for, for his support, he pays, in each case, something beyond the premium. And this brings us to the general principle, that the premium on gold does not accurately measure the advance of prices, except in those articles that we export. In all other articles, prices rise beyond the gold premium, and this rise is due to the percentage added on each exchange; to insure the seller against subsequent depreciation of the money in which he shall be paid.

Naturally the increase in price will be least in those commodities which pass directly from producer to customer, and greatest in those which are subjected to most frequent transfers. When Mr. Low buys his tea in China, he pays for it in gold. The Chinese as yet are not intelligent enough to accept "the best currency the world ever saw." When the tea is in his warehouse—freight, duties, and exchange all paid—he fixes the price. He adds to cost the usual percentage of profit and the premium on gold; but he does not stop here. He sells on time, and before the time expires gold may rise 2 or 3 per cent. He does not think it will rise so much; but it may, and, as he sees no propriety in running any risk, he adds 3 per cent. and the jobber gets Mr. Low's tea into Chicago at a cost of 3 per cent. above the premium on gold, and when my friend from Kansas stopped over last November and bought his family chests to send to Wyandotte, the Chicago merchant said, "This M. C. will not remit before the 5th of next month; by that time some more of the $44,000,000 will be out and the premium on gold, instead of being 6, as it is now, may be 10 or 12; I will add 5 per cent. to guard against loss." So when this tea reaches the little grangers at Wyandotte, though gold is up only 10 per cent., tea is up 18 per cent.; 3 per cent. added by the New York importer, and 5 per cent. added by the Chicago jobber. So in any article, especially manufactured articles, where the materials have passed through many hands, we shall have the price naturally raised far above the gold premium.

more from a depreciated currency than any one else, except the poor man who has only his own labor to sell. Why? Because the western farmer gets for his produce only the price of the foreign market. They raise and sell cotton, pork, beef, corn, wheat, cheese. The price of these in New York is always the price in Liverpool, less the price of transportation. It must be so. If the price in Liverpool were more we should export, or raise the home price. If the price in Liverpool were less we should cease to carry it there and the surplus accumulating in New York would force the New York price down to the Liverpool level. This is the theory, and this is the fact, that Liverpool fixes the price of our farm products. "But," say the friends of an irredeemable currency, "the farmer gets his price in gold and he gets the benefit of the premium; how then is he hurt?" He is hurt because the depreciation of our currency does not measure the increase in the prices of the commodities he buys. Say gold is 110; say 10 marks the depreciation of our dollar, and the farmer gets a gold dollar and changes it into $1.10, will his $1.10 buy what it used? No; rent, clothing, food, tools, horses, tea, coffee, all have advanced beyond the gold premium, and we have seen the reason. Each dealer added a percentage to guard against the loss of an uncertain currency.

And what is the RESULT TO THE FARMER?

He gets for his produce, in paper money, what he got before the war, plus the premium on gold; but everything he buys he buys at an advance greater than the premium. Wheat in Chicago before the war was $1.10 per bushel, good sugar 9 cents per pound. Now, in the same market, wheat brings $1.25 and the same sugar 11½ cents. The price of the wheat shows the premium of gold, the price of the sugar shows the premium of gold plus an advance of 12 per cent. The importer and jobber have not only charged the premium on gold to the consumer, they have also taken from him an extravagant rate for shielding them from further loss. So here the fluctuating currency was a source of wealth to the rich trader, a source of poverty to the farmer and consumer. All the manufacturers and merchants have made themselves their own insurers. They have charged the premiums, which they themselves fixed, and the laborer and farmer have had to pay them.

It is not the worst of the farmer's case that his bushel of wheat shall not bring him as much sugar, as many books, as before. It costs him, alas! more to grow it. He pays more for land, for service, for tools, for horses, more than before.

And yet the perpetuation of a financial system which robs the laborer and the farmer to fill the coffers of the merchant and the speculator is a policy urged by those who pretend to be the enemies of the rich and the friends of the poor.

In the name, then, of the laborer who consumes, and the farmer who produces, whose welfare is the welfare of the country, and whose welfare is sapped by a dishonest currency, give us a currency which has gold for its basis. This much at least we can do. We cannot do all; we cannot cure

ALL THE EVILS OF THE FINANCIAL WORLD.

Men will still fail; panics will still blast; Indianapolis will still want money; corn raised too far from market will still warm the disappointed husbandman; railroad robbers will again drive their four-in-hands; the wicked will flourish; the good will pine; Lazarus will lie outside; Dives will feast inside—in a word, man will still be human whatever currency triumphs. But with a redeemable currency we can make fewer the failures, fewer the panics, fewer the Lazaruses, fewer the Diveses, less the suffering, less the vice. Yes, I admit with it—even with an honest currency—

WE SHALL STILL HAVE PANICS.

A world which does its business on a credit basis cannot escape them; and this basis is one which grows wider as the world grows older.

The demands on credit must increase; for the world does not contain money enough to effect its business, and credit in one of its multiform shapes must continue to be the principal instrument of exchange. Only in rude barbarism does money discharge all the functions of exchange; and as civilization increases the business of the world, credit by bill, by note, by check, by book account, is forced into greater exercise.

How large a part credit plays in the business of our own country let the accomplished gentleman from Ohio tell, who long ago, by careful investigation, obtained and recorded the figures. From him we learn that part of the currency, which is money, really so or legalized—in other words, the legal-tender of a nation—bears an insignificant ratio in the grand total of exchanges. He found that the history of the of the New York banks showed that an average of 4 per cent. in legal money was employed. In an existence of seventeen years the association had made exchanges amounting to $273,661,000,000, and used $11,207,000,000.

IN THE REDEMPTION BANKS

he found the percentage 12.1 per cent. In six business days these banks effected exchanges of $154,959,665, and used $18,770,708.

IN CERTAIN COUNTRY BANKS, fairly selected from different States and Territories as having transactions nearest to the farming population, where credit is less generally used, he found the percentage 28 of money to 100 of receipts. The receipts for six days were $2,102,488, the legal money $599,328.

This was the humble part played by legal money in our own bank exchanges. What the exact percentage is in the sections without banking facilities it would be difficult to say. There it varies and in different nations it varies; but it is always small. In London, Bagehot assumes the ratio of legal-tender to total circulation is 3 per cent. In New York, as a whole, it is properly assumed at 5 per cent. In other words, out of transactions involving $100,000,000, not more than $5,000,000 of coin, greenbacks, and bank-notes are used. At least ninety-five out of every one hundred millions is paid by checks, drafts, bills, and the like. And small as this ratio is, as a more advanced civilization forces new inventions to add to the many forms credit can assume, the future will probably see that that part of the currency which is money, will, as the years go by, bear a smaller and smaller ratio to the whole amount of commercial transactions.

Try to realize this—the extent to which our people carry on their transactions on mere promises to pay, their commerce, their manufactures, their trade, all their industries, with money to pay for only fifteen one-hundredths of their business. And yet this vast system of credit stands the strain, this complicate industry goes on for years, until its delicate support is broken. That support is trust. The trust that my friend has that his bank will pay his check; the trust that I have that my friends debited in my ledger for money loaned will pay when I ask them. This enables the bank-check and the book credit, or any currency, to take the place of money.

When this support is broken, when citizens begin to doubt the solvency of banks and bankers, and neighbors the solvency of each other, the child of distrust—and all refusing every form of credit, note, or draft, or bill, or check, demand money. Currency is valueless; the delicate machinery of credit which the ages have perfected ceases to work, and man, in the frenzy of distrust, remitted to his original barbarism, will take only gold. Until the panic is hopeless, if law interferes, they will obey it, and take the legal money, which the law enforces. If the panic is hopeless, the creditor, doubting the ultimate solvency even of the government, refuses its legal-tender, and peace comes only in the utter ruin of bankruptcy. The trouble is the people have asked fifteen millions of legalized money to do the work of one hundred millions, and it cannot.

THEN COMES A PANIC—

This shows the cause of panics—the possibility in the human heart suddenly to lose its normal trust in its kind. And the human heart is the same and will act to the same causes, whether the legal money is gold or whether it is paper. We shall be liable to panics always; for we can never make the exchanges of our present civilization for money, but must always use credit mainly. And when we use credit, and the human heart remains as it is, we are always subject to the incursion of that distrust which will suddenly palsy the activity of currency, and panic will reign. All we claim is that the liability to this incursion of distrust, this panic, is naturally greater under an irredeemable currency. The evils of an irredeemable currency, to which I have already alluded, tend strongly to produce it, tend strongly to aggravate and perpetuate it when produced. The reign of paper money gives us speculation and extravagance. Both use up money rapidly, extravagance consumes, speculation wastes it, or buries it in unprofitable investment. This twofold drain is felt, and a people whose morale has been sapped by an artificial prosperity are forced to look about them. They recognize and exaggerate consequences which they have no courage to endure; and in speedy loss of hope and faith they rush to save all that to them has worth—money. And the loss of trust, which leads men temporarily to despise credit and seek only gold, is panic. Paper money has produced it; paper money will aggravate it. Had we a redeemable currency, a currency that the solvent world has, the insane want of money would be met. The gold of a thrifty population, ever looking for the most profitable market, would come to our relief. The profits offered would overcome all obstacles and drain the world, were it necessary. But it is not. It is an unreasoning panic. The arrival of a little gold, the news of it on a westering ship, breaks the spell,

AND CONFIDENCE REIGNS AGAIN.

Where we have a national currency of our own—the best in the world—there is no such remedy, no such cure. The national issue, if it has any value, has a limit. The people know that limit, know that the limit fixed for a normal condition of the market, is inadequate now. And if it has no limit, the most ignorant know it is worthless, its legality fails to give it currency, and the national issue disappears with the continental scrip, the French assignat, the Texas red-back, the South American shin-plaster.

Specie payments will not prevent panics, but they will retard and cure them.

And here, too, is the folly of an argument based on a supposition that governments can tell how much legal money is needed for a nation's wants. The per capita theory is a vain one; for the amount shifts from day to day, from market to market. In normal condition New York needs five millions of legal money to do the work of one hundred millions; in times of panic New York needs one hundred millions of legal money to do the work of one hundred millions. What amount shall the anxious legislator manufacture for New York's wants? Shall he make it one hundred millions? Then it will take two dollars to buy a ten-penny loaf when there is no panic. Shall he make it five millions? If the panic continues he can buy his ten-penny loaf for half a cent. I would counsel the anxious legislator under these circumstances to hold off, and let God and nature take care of man's wants.

Without further discussion let us assume,

1. That gold is the only basis of a sound currency.
2. That paper redeemable in gold is the best currency.
3. That currency must always perform the larger part of the world's exchanges.
4. That currency is that form of credit which gets its birth in business transactions, and represents an existing value—either gold or property.
5. That currency, untrammeled by governmental interference, regulates its own volume.
6. That governmental credit, not representing gold in the Treasury, not issued against property in existence, but against property consumed or destroyed, is a bastard currency; and, as a foreign and superfluous element, depreciates the currency of the people.
7. That a depreciated currency inflicts moral ill upon all classes, but throws the material loss and suffering mainly on the farmer and laborer.
8. That a depreciated currency tends to create and aggravate panics.
9. That it is our duty to legislate in the direction of specie payments.

Now we come to the

BILL OF THE COMMITTEE.

I break no confidence in saying it is the bill of no member—it is literally the bill of the committee—the result of conflicting views. A part of its provisions I like, a part I do not. But I am willing, as a whole, to take it. I believe there is more good in it than harm. It points and moves in the direction of specie payment. That is something. It tells the people we mean to be honest, when we can afford it; that we will make no more forced loans—issue no more greenbacks; but will by degrees redeem them all. Perhaps, after all, it is not safe to go faster.

But with so strong a motive I would dare the risk of proclaiming resumption as the chief glory of our centennial; relying upon our ability to borrow sufficient gold by the sale of our bonds. It would be the brightest star in Philadelphia's galaxy. I believe that gold enough, without panic, could be obtained in the European market to answer the demands of a graduated resumption, which should be complete on the Fourth of July, 1876. The suffering, in my opinion, occasioned by such resumption would be slight compared with those following a depreciated currency.

But in this opinion a majority of my colleagues of the committee do not share, and the result is the which provides for the gradual reduction of the amount of legal-tender. That method was selected as the one involving the least distress. The contraction is gradual and slow. At the beginning the currency is not contracted at all. The quantity of national notes is not changed. A portion of them are changed in quality; are of a higher value; but this value is not for some time appreciable, and to the end they can be used as legal-tender. For the two millions each month withdrawn, two millions are immediately substituted. These two millions discharge all the functions of the original greenback, although they have the further merit of carrying the promise of repayment in gold at a definite time.

We have, therefore, until two years have elapsed, still four hundred millions of promises out; but of these promises two millions monthly are assuming a definite and respectable character. For two years, then, there can be no contraction of the volume. But will not the gold greenback be hoarded? Yes, by the banks, who, being forced to keep a reserve in greenbacks, will release their paper greenbacks, and use these instead. The banks need one hundred and forty millions for their reserve, so that the banks will furnish a depository for more than the fifty millions which can be issued for two years. After two years there will be contraction by the amount of two millions for each month. In the mean time, should private citizens compete with the banks for the gold greenback, which is scarcely probable until the reserve of the banks is supplied, the gold greenbacks in private hands furnish a slight elasticity to the currency which may have its use.

THE GOLD GREENBACK

at the issue is worth scarcely more than the paper greenback; but as it approaches the time of payment increases rapidly in value, so that the tendency constantly increases to withdraw it from circulation. But, as it is still money, a great demand for money increasing its rate would force it into market again.

Let us not forget, in examining this method, that the action taken is final and cannot, by indirection, be repealed by the Government. The dishonored and indefinite promises that have been withdrawn are canceled, never to be reissued. In their place are promises so explicit and definite that no Congress would dare to break them. Two millions of irredeemable paper is destroyed each month, and cannot, except by direct act of sovereignty, be re-created.

It should not be unnoticed in considering the value of this measure that free from subtlety and complication; one within the comprehension of the plain citizen. This is as it should be. If Government will meddle with that which it should leave alone, at least let this interference be such as the people can understand and intelligently conform to.

This is an easy measure, and, alas! a slow measure of resumption.

If we offered no quicker results we were bound to make provisions which should guard the long interim as far as possible from the evils of our depreciated currency. It was not, therefore, sufficient for this committee to offer only a method of resumption which in many years would bring this country to specie payments. It was necessary that they should also provide what safeguards could be devised against the recurrence of panics in the mean time.

We have seen that the natural tendency of a depreciated currency is to lead indirectly to the destruction of that trust which is the foundation of all currency. We have seen that this destruction of trust is the occasion of panic. In the absence of trust, in the temporary destruction of currency, only money is prized. In countries where the currency is normal the duration of panics is stopped, by attracting to the points of stringency, by the offer of large interest, the money of the world. Here is an analogy which should guide us in the organization and management of the artificial currency which we have created.

When, under our system, this lack of trust destroys the functions of currency, and a frightened people refuse to accept aught else than the substitute the law forces upon them, if the amount of money is limited, from what source can the panic get its relief? It cannot fall back upon the markets of the world. The world, unfortunately, has not its best currency.

What is wanted, is that elasticity which the laws of trade supply in those countries which enjoy the currency of the world. In what way can an artificial elasticity be established which shall measurably supply this want? There seems to be no other than which the bill embodies. Government cannot supply it. How can the Government bank? On what? Could it issue, it would be an unnatural currency. It would pass only under the compulsion of law. But the circulation of the bank would be regulated by demand, and would represent and be backed by the capital of the bank or other property. This is, of course, only true of a bank that expects to redeem.

Banking without such expectation would tempt the banks to use, in other forms, their capital and to preserve none of it in a shape ready for the redemption of its notes. Having put out their notes, without fear of redemption, the capital which represented these notes, and the property in exchange for which they issued them, would be by them placed in permanent investments, out of their reach for purposes of redemption, practically destroyed. Then the bank-note would cease to be legitimate currency. Like the Government note, it becomes the representative of poverty, not of wealth—of that consumed, not that existing—and would be only an additional, foreign, and dangerous element in the circulation.

But if the

they are forced to maintain within their control the values which their notes represented, and their notes, therefore, remain a sound and healthy currency. The health of free banking depends entirely upon redemption. Were the banks required to redeem in gold, there could be no doubt of the wisdom of removing any restrictions upon the volume of their issue; but in our case Government has interfered with the laws of trade and redemption may be made in legalized rather than real money.

Under these conditions redemption is an experiment. Whether the legal-tender, itself a piece of paper, can be made so superior to the bank-note that the holder of the bank-note will prefer to exchange it for the legal-tender, is yet a problem to be solved. To insure the success of the experiment, all artificial means of increasing the value of the legal-tender should be adopted. The bill of the committee finds the legal-tender now superior to the bank-note, mainly in the fact that the legal-tender is the bank's reserve. This insures the co-operation of the banks. They will force redemption as far as their influence reaches. Is their influence sufficient to regulate the whole issue? I am of opinion that it is; that whether the citizen prefers the national note to the bank-note or not, if the banks do, a safe and practical redemption is secured. The dangers of a fixed volume of such currency as passes for money, in view of the probability of panics, is such that the prudent mind may well choose the risk of practical redemption. There is danger of less suffering from an excessive issue of bank-notes which are not sent home for redemption, than there is from the devastations of a panic, which would be aggravated by a limited issue. Even without the restraints of redemption there is little danger of an excessive issue. The profits of the banking system are no longer great. The purchase of the bonds requires much money. The $56,000,000 issued in 1870 has but just been distributed. Under these circumstances the risk cannot be great.

We could afford to run a greater risk simply to check that cry of "monopoly" which will be urged loudly and with reason as long as a restriction which has let in certain citizens excludes others from the profits of the banking business.

NOTICE THE LAST PROVISION.

It practically directs that we shall not use our gold to buy bonds; that we will pay, or save our gold to pay, obligations that are due, before we anticipate the payment of obligations not due. This is simple business thrift and honesty. Our gold can still be used for the expenses of Government when needed. With this drain upon the Treasury and the diminished income of the Government, gentlemen who deal in gold need have no fear that the accumulations will be much beyond the necessities of the monthly payments. I fear they may fall short. In that case the deficiency must be met by a sale of bonds or increased taxation. Against such deficiency the Ways and Means Committee of another Congress may need to report. But the sale of a few bonds, or a tax upon tea and coffee, is better than forever to continue the disgrace of an irredeemable currency.

Another objection is, the gold greenback makes another kind of currency. That is an objection; but both kinds perform the same functions, and, if in circulation, must pass at the same value.

THE LAST OBJECTION

is, gradual as the process is, it is a process ultimately of contraction, and must entail some suffering. This is true. It is idle to disguise it. We can regain specie payments only at a cost. But it is worth the cost. The people are ready to bear the pain; they clamor for the knife that shall save them. Shall we lack the courage to apply it to a willing patient? It needs only the determination, the start. Begin to rid us of a depreciated currency that stops our trade, saps our morals, and makes the rich richer, the poor poorer. Begin to give us a sound currency, the dollar of the fathers, the dollar of the world. We freed the slave; we saved the Union; we will pay our debts.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to ask my friend from New Jersey a question. He announces that he speaks in behalf of the poor laborer of his State and of other States, who, he says, has suffered and is suffering on account of this depreciated currency. The question I desire to ask him is this: Whether the advanced price of labor is not four times greater than the present premium on gold?

Mr. PHELPS. My answer to that would be, first, to deny the premises. I do not think "the price of labor is four times greater than the present premium on gold." If my friend is correct in supposing that labor has increased fourfold beyond the premium on gold, I make this reply: Much more certainly than he can show the price of labor has increased four times beyond the premium of gold; I can show the price of living has increased six times. Grant that the laborer gets 40 per cent. more than he once did, it costs him 60 per cent. more to live than then. And my answer to him now, which has been categorical, does not include the moral influences of a depreciated currency, which ultimately stops manufactures, ultimately stops trade, and so tends to deprive the laborer of all wages.

What is the result? A depreciated currency slowly raises the wages of the laborer; but at last the bubble bursts. Laborers instead of obtaining advanced wages cannot obtain wages at all. And if the gentleman wants to know whether the laborer with our depreciated currency gets an increase of wages four times greater than the premium on gold, let him go to Paterson and ask those five thousand mechanics who do not get any wages at all.

Mr. MERRIAM. In the panic of 1857, when we were banking upon a gold basis, were not these people more distressed than now?

[Here the hammer fell.]

At the expiration of Mr. PHELLPS's hour, by arrangement, his time was extended for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, Mr. Speaker, good faith and wise policy forbid us to go further in the path the House has pointed out, the path of inflation; and, indeed, wise policy is the same as good faith. It always pays—using the lowest form of expression—always pays to do right; and, as I shall try to show, if this nation stands pledged to any course in political affairs, firmly and irrevocably pledged, it is to the resumption of specie payments. And certainly there is no road to resumption through expansion except the road that passes through repudiation.

THE LEGAL-TENDER ACTS.

Pardon me if I call attention to some well-known facts in legislation on this subject. I shall not dwell upon them. We are pledged to resumption clearly by the very first act, that of February 25, 1862, which authorized a legal tender, which made $150,000,000 of notes a legal tender in payment of all debts, except, &c., and proceeded to say that any holders of United States notes depositing any sum not less than fifty dollars, and beyond that in muitiple of fifty, with the Treasurer, should receive in exchange 6 per cent. gold bonds.

Now, sir, there were serious doubts in regard to the constitutionality of legal-tenders. Some of our ablest and most patriotic men protested that we had no right, even in war times, even under the pressure of war necessity, to make a paper promise to pay a legal tender for debts; and even great as they thought the necessity was, they refused to vote for that bill. But those who did urge it put into it the clause that these notes were convertible on presentation into gold notes, with interest payable in gold; which was as nearly an equivalent to gold as they could provide, and clearly recognized the obligation to keep the gold standard in view.

In the next act, that of July 11, 1862, which authorized another one hundred and fifty millions, there was a similar provision, and that every depositor of fifty dollars, or of multiples thereof, should be entitled to have the notes converted into gold bonds paying gold interest. The act of March 3, 1863, worked a partial repudiation of this promise, but its intent was to hurry up the conversion, and limited the time of presentation to July 1, 1863.

Well, sir, we come next to the pledge not to go over four hundred million dollars; all the while, even in the agony of war, proceeding with discretion and deliberation, always keeping in mind that we were bound to make these notes convertible in some form into gold. Fearing there was truth in the prophecies of those men who said this was like the letting out of water and there would be no end to paper money, Congress put into the law of June 30, 1864, this pledge:

Nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed four hundred millions of dollars, and such additional sum, not exceeding fifty millions of dollars, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loans.

RESOLUTION AND ACT AUTHORIZING CONTRACTION.

There is one more solemn declaration of Congress to which I desire to call your attention. Mr. McCulloch in his first annual report, dated December 4, 1865, expresses as his opinion "that the legal-tender acts were war measures, passed in a great emergency"—the Supreme Court holds that to-day—"that they shall be regarded only as temporary; that they ought not to remain in force a day longer than would be necessary to enable the people to prepare for a return to the gold standard; and that the work of retiring the notes which have been issued should be commenced without delay, and carefully and persistently continued until all are retired." That is the gospel of the matter. They ought not to remain in force a day longer than would enable the people to prepare for their being withdrawn. How was that declaration of the Secretary received by Congress? The following resolution was offered:

Resolved, That this House cordially concurs in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of a contraction of the currency, with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business of the country will permit; and we hereby pledge co-operative action to this end as speedily as possible.

They concurred and they pledged co-operative action. Who voted for that? There voted for that resolution one hundred and forty-four members of this House against six, and among those who voted in the affirmative I observe the names of DAWES, and ELDREDGE, and GARFIELD, and HALE of New York, and HOOPER, KASSON, and KELLEY, and MYERS, and NIBLACK, and LAWRENCE, and MARSHALL, and ORTH, and RANDALL, SAWYER, and SCOFIELD. And only six men, not one of whom answers to the roll-call here to-day, were in the opposition. By a practically unanimous vote this House formally declared that the policy of contraction was the true policy, and that we must return as soon as possible to specie payments.

Pursuing that policy, Congress enacted April 12, 1866, the law authorizing the Secretary to fund all loose, outlying temporary obligations, and further provided—

That of United States notes not more than ten millions may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

Under this law the temporary loans were all called in and the pledge to maintain the extreme limit of four hundred millions remained. But under the authority granted the Secretary retired also forty-four millions of the legal-tenders, reducing the aggregate to three hundred and fifty-six millions.

These things you did when the influence of the war was fresh upon you; when you dared to do right, or to aim toward it, even if it did cost a little. Well, contraction did hurt; there was the pain that accompanies the eradication of disease. The law of February 4, 1868, says—

That from and after the passage or this act the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency by retiring or canceling United States notes shall be, and is hereby, suspended.

But Congress did not authorize a reissue. It authorized retiring and canceling, and every dollar of those notes which McCulloch retired under that authority of Congress was canceled, burned, destroyed, annihilated; and when we talk about the $44,000,000 reserve, we talk about that which has existed in imagination only, for there has not been one dollar of the reserve in existence. That which has since been issued under the name of the "reserve" has been printed anew. Nowhere has it appeared in the annual report of the Secretary that this reserve really existed, and he has never accounted for it. He has reported the indebtedness of the United States in the form of legal-tender notes at three hundred and fifty-six millions; but where do you find him accounting for forty-four millions, or any part thereof, supposed to be held in his strong box?

CROWNING THE CAMPAIGN OF 1868.

But, sir, I have other pledges to read you. Another and more formal pledge was given after the great campaign of 1868 and the inauguration of General Grant. A republican Congress came here fresh from a long, thorough, and exhausting discussion of this great question. There had been more or less of doubt as to what should be done with the bonds, and what should be done with the currency. An appeal was made to the people. The republican platform of 1868 admitted of no doubtful interpretation. You came here and solemnly voted, March 18, 1869:

Be it enacted, &c., That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the law by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared, that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money, or in other currency than gold and silver; but none of the said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time as United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time as bonds of the United States, bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed, can be sold at par in coin; and the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of United States notes in coin.

You could not commit your Government more solemnly than by the first act signed by the then and now President of the United States, and it was to the great honor of the cause of republican government the world over. Is there any reason in morals or politics, any reason admissible in decent company for a deliberate departure—shall we call it a final departure—from that policy?

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGES.

But there are still other committals. Every single message of the President of the United States, from that time to this day, has reaffirmed that doctrine, and urged is importance upon the Congress of the United States. In every message is that doctrine laid down, and it has apparently received the unanimous approval of the republican party, and the approval also of a large portion of the democratic party—certainly of many of its ablest journals.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will allow me to say that I approved of the President's message in that regard, and introduced a resolution into this House copying his message in that respect, but the republicans voted it down.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That was because they doubted the gentleman who offered it. [Laughter.] They did not doubt his soundness on the specie-payment question.

Mr. COX. Ever since this question has been before the country I suppose I have been the soundest man in the House, and I shall vindicate my record to-morrow; but I repeat that the republicans voted down their own President's recommendation as copied by me in hæc verba.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am very glad to say the gentleman is quite right on this great question; but when he dressed up the President's message the republicans did not recognize it. [Laughter.]

In his inaugural of March 4, 1869, the President said:

A great debt has been contracted in securing to us and our posterity the Union. The payment of this, principal and interest, as well as the return to a specie basis, as soon as it can be accomplished without material detriment to the debtor class or to the country at large, must be provided for. To protect the national honor every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold, unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Let it be understood that no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public places, and it will go far toward strengthening a credit which ought to be the best in the world, and will ultimately enable us to replace the debt with bonds bearing less interest than we now pay. * *

How the public debt is to be paid, or specie payments resumed, is not so important, as that a plan should be adopted and acquiesced in.

A united determination to do is worth more than divided counsels upon the method of doing.

In his second inaugural, March 4, 1873, are these passages:

My efforts in the future will be directed * * * to the restoration of our currency to a fixed value, as compared with the world's standard of values—gold—and if possible to a par with it.

His first annual message, December 6, 1869, contains this:

Among the evils growing out of the rebellion, and not yet referred to, is that of an irredeemable currency. It is an evil which I hope will receive your most earnest attention. It is a duty, and one of the highest duties of government, to secure to the citizen a medium of exchange of fixed, unvarying value. This implies a return to a specie basis, and no substitute for it can be devised. It should be commenced now, and reached at the earliest practicable moment, consistent with a fair regard to the interests of the debtor class.

His second annual message, December 5, 1870, has this:

The approach to a specie basis is very gratifying, but the fact cannot be denied that the instability of the value of our currency is prejudicial to our prosperity, and tends to keep up prices to the detriment of trade. The evils of a depreciated and fluctuating currency are so great that now, when the premium on gold has fallen so much, it would seem that the time has arrived when, by wise and prudent legislation, Congress should look to a policy which would place our currency at par with gold at no distant day.

In his third annual message, December 4, 1871, he said:

Continued fluctuations in the value of gold, as compared with the national currency, has a most damaging effect upon the increase and development of the country in keeping up prices of all articles necessary in every-day life. It fosters a spirit of gambling prejudicial alike to national morals and the national finances. If the question can be met as to how to give a fixed value to our currency, that value constantly and uniformly approaching par with specie, a very desirable object will be gained. * * * * * * *

In his fourth annual message, December 2, 1872, he said:

The preservation of our national credit is of the highest importance; next in importance to this comes a solemn duty to provide a national currency of fixed, unvarying value as compared with gold, and as soon as practicable, having due regard for the interests of the debtor class and the vicissitudes of trade and commerce, convertible into gold at par.

In his fifth annual message, December 1, 1873, speaking of the panic of 1872, he said:

My own judgment is, that however much individuals may have suffered, one long step has been taken toward specie payments; that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is enacted, and that a specie basis cannot be enacted and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

* * * * * * *

These suggestions are thrown out, * * * hoping that the best method may be arrived at to secure such an elasticity of the currency as will keep employed all the industries of the country, and prevent such an inflation as will put off indefinitely the resumption of specie payments, an object so devoutly to be wished for by all, and by none more earnestly than the class of people most directly interested—those who "earn their bread by the sweat of their brow."

THE PARTY PLATFORMS.

Do you remember your party pledges? It will not do to say in a jocular way that those pledges amount to nothing. You did not say that during the campaign, and the honest citizens of the country did not understand you as joking with them upon the great matter of the national faith. They believed you when you stood on the stump and solemnly promised that the United States should be true to all its obligations. They were red-hot from the war, and had fresh in their minds the deep devotion of that awful time, and they held that it was as important to maintain the honor of the Government in the payment of its obligations as to maintain the unity of the nation on the battle-field.

In the Chicago republican platform of 1868 the republican party said:

We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime; and the national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the uttermost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted.

And the republican national convention of 1872, in Philadelphia, said:

We denounce the repudiation of the public debt in any form or disguise as a national crime.

It said:

We witness with pride the reduction of the principal of the debt and of the rates of interest on the balance, and confidently expect that our excellent national currency will be perfected by the speedy resumption of specie payments.

I say that there are interests in this country that never would have carried you through to victory if you had not made that pledge to the people. And what stronger language can we find than the following from the platform of the liberal and democratic national conventions of 1872?

The public credit must be sacredly maintained, and we denounce repudiation in every form and guise. * * * * * * *

A speedy return to specie payments is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government.

Mr. DAWES. Would not my friend like to put right here in his speech the resolutions of the democratic State convention of Connecticut the other day?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will put it in. If I recollect aright it was stubbornly in favor of specie payments.

Mr. DAWES. Here it is.

Mr. COX. What was it in New York last year?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It was all right. I will read the democratic resolution from Connecticut:

We recognize in the present stringency of the money market, the panic which led thereto, the general prostration of business, and the consequent suffering of the working classes, the direct fruits of that policy which, while it pretends to advance the interests of the country, is, in reality, plunging us into national and individual bankruptcy and ruin; and as an offset to this policy we demand, and we call upon the people to inaugurate, a speedy return to specie payments, as called for alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest and economical government.

That is the voice of the democracy of Connecticut.

Mr. COX, [applauding.] Exactly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish the democracy all over the United States was as honestly standing on the old-fashioned democratic Jackson and Benton hard-money foundation as is the democracy of Connecticut.

Mr. SMALL. There would be one more to applaud if they were. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. New Hampshire stood upon that doctrine the other day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I happen to have in my pocket the republican platform of Connecticut, and I ought now to read that also:

That there ought to be no further increase of the paper currency of the country; and that the people expect from the present Congress the adoption of such measures as will forward the early resumption of specie payments.

So we talk and so we vote from the beginning to the end in my State.

Mr. MAYNARD. That shows that they have all the money there they want.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. So the nation stands pledged in all the ways in which pledges can be made, by what I may call the prayerful legislation of Congress—legislation perfected within sound of the thunders of the enemy's cannon—by the pledges of your party platform, by the messages of its President, and by its national party platforms; in all ways and at all times. Yes, and again within the last year, as I shall show you, though I doubt whether one-half of the House at the time knew it. You enacted, February 12, 1873—

That the gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which, at the standard weight of twenty-five and one-tenth grains, shall be the unit of value.

That is the measure of value, the unit of value as declared by a law which passed here without objection. There is no financier of any school who could have made a respectable argument against that act.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest a thought?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have in my hand a one-dollar note; it is not of much account. On the back is a pledge, which if it had been complied with I think would have done very much to accomplish the results which the gentleman and myself have so ardently and anxiously looked for. "This note is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." That was a law of Congress, I believe. Does not the gentleman think that, if that pledge had been complied with, we should have been to-day very much nearer specie resumption than we are, having repudiated that law which stands upon our statute-books?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Receivable for all obligations except——

Mr. ELDREDGE. "This note is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." It will not pay our bonded debt.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I understand.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yet it seems as though it ought to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If you want to try that over again, just begin. If you think you can delude the people of this country into paying its bonds in paper, in taking up a long obligation which the whole world understood was payable in gold, and discharging a solemn bond with protested demand notes—if you want to try that again, try it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My friend has not answered my question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will answer it. I do not think it would have helped us toward resumption. I think that course would have plunged us into bankruptcy; it would have been taken all over the world as an act of national repudiation.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think that one thing which has kept us from specie resumption more than any other is that we have had two classes of obligations, one for the rich, one for the poor; the rich to be paid in gold, and the poor in repudiated paper.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Very good. What I want is one currency, based upon the standard unit of value, 25.8 grains of gold for the dollar of every kind. I want one standard; but I want it just as good for one class as for another.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is what I want; and therefore I thought my point would strike the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I would make the poor man's money just as good as the rich man's—not depreciate anybody's money. Let us lift the whole to the one true level.

OUR DEPARTURES FROM THE FAITH.

How have we redeemed our pledges to secure redemption at the earliest practicable moment? We have been increasing our paper money. We have increased the fractional currency from $27,000,000 to $48,000,000. We have increased the bank circulation $54,000,000 under the pretext, I know, that we were recalling the $54,000,000 of three per cents; and we have bought bonds when we should have redeemed notes. Let me ask your attention to the policy of the Treasury Department within the last five years; for it is the first time I have ever had so good an opportunity to say that I think that policy has been wrong in this respect. We have bought bonds in excess of the needs of the sinking fund to the extent of at least $220,000,000; we have bought them in the market at an average gold price of 95.19, while there was upon the statute-book your act of 1869 saying that you would not pay your bonds, except in gold, or until the legal-tender note was as good as gold. Leaving your demand notes protested, and at a discount in the market, you take advantage of your depreciated national credit, and with your own depreciated demand paper go into the market and buy up the long bonds, that you were under no obligation to pay for years to come—you buy these up at a discount in gold. Now, how would any merchant stand in the commercial world who, letting his demand notes go protested, should run around, and, because his credit was not good, should buy up, at less than one hundred cents on the dollar, his long indebtedness, secured by mortgage? That is what we have done. I do not say there was a corrupt purpose; I do not denounce any one as guilty of a great wickedness; but it was not sound financial policy. Our first duty was with the demand notes that we had out, and that were injuring us as individuals and as a nation by their service as a depreciated currency.

We had an unconstitutional inflation of $44,000,000, so far as we can accomplish it in this House; and we are considering to-day a measure which its friends hope will still further inflate an irredeemable currency. I speak of this as an unconstitutional inflation of the currency to the extent of $44,000,000; for from a careful perusal of all the acts concerning it, I believe, with the majority of the Finance Committee in the Senate, that when you had once got down to $356,000,000, there was no authority anywhere on the part of anybody to issue that money again. That money having been once called in and paid, I hold that the issue of another dollar of legal-tenders stood upon precisely the same ground, and required just as much constitutional authority as the original issue of the legal-tenders; and as the legal-tenders could not be issued except in time of war, and as you had not a war necessity when these legal-tenders were reissued, you had no right to turn out again any part of the $44,000,000 thus recalled. And if I could have my way; if the Supreme Court were such a court as I should constitute; if I had the power, I would have this last bill of yours just passed declared as unconstitutional as I believe it to be. You have no right to issue legal-tenders except in time of war; and, upon my soul, I very seriously doubt both your necessity and your right to do it even then. But as the measure was believed to be one of necessity, adopted when we were engaged in a life or death struggle, the act is to be pardoned on that account.

Mr. HEREFORD. I understand the gentleman to say that this recent issue of $44,000,000 was contrary to law and unconstitutional.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I so believe it.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then will you join in a vote of censure upon the Secretary of the Treasury for issuing those legal-tenders illegally and unconstitutionally? Will you vote to impeach him for it?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. In answer to that I say——

Mr. HEREFORD. The Secretary of the Treasury having done an illegal and unconstitutional act, will you vote to impeach him?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Wait a moment; let me answer in my own way, as I have the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] a question: Does he propose to impeach everybody who differs from him in opinion?

Mr. HEREFORD. No, sir; but my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] spoke of this as an illegal and unconstitutional act done by a member of the Administration of his own political party. Now, I ask him whether he will vote to impeach that officer?

Mr. DAWES. That is the opinion of my friend from Connecticut. The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury—as honest an opinion as that of my friend from Connecticut——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Precisely.

Mr. DAWES. Is just the opposite. I agree with my friend from Connecticut. But the Secretary of the Treasury has the opinion of the Attorney-General behind him.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] vote to impeach the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will not the gentleman vote to impeach public officers for a violation of the plain letter of the law and the Constitution?

Mr. DAWES. I will vote to impeach any officer for a corrupt and willful violation of the Constitution and the law; but when an officer acts in the honest discharge of a duty about which there may be a difference of opinion, and in which I believe him to be just as honest in the entertainment of his opinion as I am in mine, I do not propose to impeach him any more than I would impeach my friend from West Virginia for entertaining opinions upon the currency diametrically opposite to mine, though just as honest as mine are.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will my friend from Massachusetts allow me——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I must stop this. I like a hearty fight, but I prefer to be in it myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. The gentleman had better stop it right there.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has sufficiently answered the question. I can see very clearly, as every candid man can, that I may believe the action of a member of the Administration to be unconstitutional and unauthorized by law, or that of a judge of the Supreme Court, as is suggested to me by my eminent friend here, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] and yet I may see no cause in that for impeachment. I am not ready to impeach the Secretary of the Treasury. Though I think he did wrongly, though I think he was greatly mistaken, I have no doubt that he acted conscientiously on his own best judgment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose the gentleman is aware there are others besides the Secretary of the Treasury who agree in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. There are many who agree with the Secretary of the Treasury in that respect. I have no doubt there are people in abundance who want more paper printed, and who care very little about the way in which it is done. I have no doubt there are many able men who agree that he had the right to issue that $44,000,000. But, sir, I am so fanatical on that question that I do not believe, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means does not believe, he had any constitutional authority to issue that money.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me to say right here that the Supreme Court of the United States has never decided any legal-tender notes to be valid except those legal-tender notes which were authorized in time of war?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Precisely. That decision of the Supreme Court which reluctantly admitted the constitutionality of the legal-tender notes never gave so much as an intimation that it would be right to issue them in time of peace. Is it not so?

Mr. POTTER. I do not say that; I was not speaking of the opinions of the court, but of their decision; but I say as a matter of fact it has never been decided that any legal-tender notes except those authorized during the war were constitutional.

Mr. GARFIELD. They restricted the issue to the emergency of war, and I should think it excluded the ordinary issue.

Mr. ELDREDGE rose.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I decline to be interrupted any further.

I hold the Supreme Court decided only the question that under a great war necessity, of which Congress must under the circumstances be the judge, it might issue legal-tender notes, but I hold the necessary effect of the decision of the court is against the power to issue them in time of peace. But I must hurry on.

THE "BUSINESS INTERESTS" AGAINST INFLATION.

We are told, sir, that the business of the country demands more irredeemable and inconvertible paper. I deny it. I know there is a sort of temporary public sentiment, as it is called, which wants more money. "More money!" I want more money, Mr. Speaker, and you want more money, and so does everybody want more money; but in reality we want more wealth, more capital. But I think the real representative of the real business of the country is in favor of no more irredeemable paper, is opposed to our taking any further steps in the downward march to bankruptcy and repudiation. And I must express my belief, if members of Congress, instead of yielding to this false sentiment, instead of being influenced as we are by great corporations who need more paper, if we had all gone directly to the people and told them to face the national evil, and that sound policy demanded we should stop in the downward march and climb back, however painful it might be, toward resumption; if we had told them plainly and honestly to fight it out, we could have the country with us to-day. For, sir, I do not distrust the willingness of the country, even if there be something of embarrassment or pain in it, to move in what they believe is the right path. If we are right I think the people can and will be led to see it.

Let us see what is the opinion of the prominent representatives of the business world. What do the petitioners from New York City say?

Your petitioners respectfully represent that they view with alarm the proposition before Congress for increasing the volume of the currency.

They believe that any additional issue of paper money, either directly by the Government or indirectly by the national banks by authority of the Government, would be most injurious to the interests of the nation.

The country is now suffering, and has been for the past twelve years, great loss and inconvenience arising from an irredeemable currency. Values of all kinds of merchandise and other property are continually fluctuating, owing to the constantly changing price of gold, and thus no certain calculations can be made in business. Speculation of all kinds is stimulated by the excessive volume of the currency, and the minds of the whole nation are demoralized and rendered unfit for the pursuits of steady industry.

Your petitioners beg leave to represent most earnestly that a resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable time is imperatively required by the true interests of the nation, and they most respectfully deprecate the issue of any more currency, as such a proceeding would postpone indefinitely a return to a sound financial condition.

Your petitioners therefore pray that no more issues of paper shall take place, and that the greenbacks already issued out of the so-called reserve shall be withdrawn again as speedily as possible.

This petition is signed by over two hundred of the most prominent business men, among whom are Brown Bros. & Co., Duncan, Sherman & Co., Drexel, Morgan & Co., Morton, Bliss & Co., John J. Cisco & Co., Grinnell, Minturn & Co., Howland & Aspinwall, A. A. Low & Bros., Cooper, Hewitt & Co., Phelps, Dodge & Co., Harper Bros., Moses Taylor, Marshall O. Roberts, Shepherd Knapp, George S. Coe, Arnold, Constable & Co., J. & W. Seligman, Vermilye & Co., D. Appleton & Co., Benedict, Hall & Co., Devlin & Co., S. B. Chittenden & Co., Orange Judd & Co., Lord & Taylor, and others representing the larger operations in banking, and foreign and domestic commerce and trade in general.

But gentlemen say they are capitalists. True; they are men who know what a good currency must be to have business prosperous, and they as much as anybody are interested in a correct standard of value.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he believes that there is any man whose name he has mentioned, or any other signer of that petition, who does not have a large interest in the stock of the present banking monopolies of the country?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have no doubt they have a great deal of money, and that is one of the reasons why I read their petition. They do not want the currency of the country to be so deranged that they cannot prosecute a successful business. And I give them credit for something more than pure selfishness in the matter. I give them credit for having some regard for the interest of the whole nation, and not considering their own pockets alone.

We have had referred to the committee also a petition from the leading men of Portland. The people of Boston have again and again, through their boards of trade and otherwise, declared their opinion. From Philadelphia we have eighty names of leading merchants and bankers. From Chicago we have thirty names, twenty-two of banks and the remainder of savings-banks, protesting against any further issue. We have a petition also from Chicago, with four hundred and seventy-two names of business men, protesting against any more irredeemable paper. Besides that we have from Chicago two hundred names of leading wholesale and other firms, all protesting against inflation. Nine out of ten of the wholesale firms applied to signed the protest, and more names could have been got if there had been time. We have, then, about seven hundred names of wholesale merchants, bankers, and men of business in Chicago. We have a petition from one hundred and forty-six business firms of Cincinnati who view with alarm these attempts to increase the currency. They say they "view with alarm the various bills to increase the irredeemable paper currency, and pray that Congress may not authorize its increase in any form whatever. Inflation would again stimulate wild speculations, promote gambling in stocks and in gold, retard the restoration of the specie standard, and produce in the end general disaster."

That I hold to be a fair representation of the opinion of the business men of Cincinnati.

THE BOARDS OF TRADE.

The boards of trade are composed of leading merchants and capitalists; men who desire to see their cities prosper, and who are willing to lend a hand to new manufacturing enterprises, and who watch over the railroad and river commerce of their respective cities. They know something of what business requires. And the Cincinnati Board of Trade advise "careful and patient preparation," but conclude decidedly—

That the further inflation of the volume of irredeemable currency would be injurious to the country and retard the restoration of the specie standard.

The Baltimore Board of Trade say substantially the same thing. But, without dwelling at greater length on the action of these various local boards, I call attention to the National Board of Trade, which at every session it has held since the war has denounced the expansion of an irredeemable paper currency and called for a return to the specie standard. At its last meeting, since we have been in session this winter, it adopted the following resolutions:

First. That the National Board of Trade recommends to Congress that there shall be no further issues of irredeemable paper whatsoever.

Secondly. That, in the opinion of this board, it is the first duty of the Government to provide for the retirement and cancellation of so much of the legal-tender issue as has been taken from the so-called forty-four million reserve.

I notice in the action of the national board in 1871 that every western city voted for speedy resumption.

And the Chamber of Commerce of New York has sent here a formal and very able argument and earnest memorial upon the subject. These representative men say:

In the judgment of this chamber the time has come when a just regard to the commercial and financial interests of the country demands a return to specie payment or the institution of such measures as will lead to resumption at an early day; that with the least possible delay the "promise" of the United States given under the sanction of law and enforced by a "solemn pledge" should be made as good as the national bond, and honored at sight as the other is paid at maturity.

That is the view which the business world takes of this question. It does not demand inflation. Even if it did, we ought not to grant it. We promised to pay specie, sir, as I have shown you beyond the power of contradiction, and we must do it.

THE EVILS OF PAPER MONEY.

The evils of an expanded and irredeemable paper currency are infinite. I take leave to quote what has been again and again quoted here, and which ought to be kept before us written in the usual letters of gold. They are the words of an old-fashioned statesman, one of the greatest minds the country has ever produced. I mean, of course, Daniel Webster, who knew something of constitutional law and something of financial policy, for he was not ashamed to confess himself the "book economist" sometimes sneered at here, and to say that he had read everything that he could get on the subject. He said:

Of all the contrivances for cheating mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field with the sweat of the poor man's brow.

Every word of that is true, and will be true to the end of time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman leaves that portion of his subject will he have the kindness to cite the two sentences immediately preceding that which he has quoted from Mr. Webster's speech?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have only what I have quoted. If anywhere Daniel Webster ever said that he would countenance irredeemable paper, pray let the words be read.

WHICH WAY?

We have again come to a parting of the ways, where a choice must be made between two very widely diverging courses, between two very hostile systems.

I now call your attention again to the act passed February 12, 1874, wherein you said deliberately that there shall be a gold "one-dollar piece which at the standard weight of twenty-five and eight-tenths shall be the unit of value." That is the measure of value, and when you put out this paper saying that you promise to pay a dollar you must have a measure, a standard of value, something to show what a dollar is. Now, what shall be the standard? Shall it be twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of gold? Will that be your aim and goal? Will you start in that direction, or will you turn in the other direction?

On the other hand, it is openly avowed that we never shall see specie payment; that that is money which the law calls money; that paper based on the faith of the nation up to the whole extent of the wealth of the nation is good money; and we are urged, moreover, to let the supply of paper money continue, to be regulated only by the demand; that is, to endeavor to satisfy by legislation the desire to borrow. Having within our reach a universal language of commerce, a language which the world knows and understands, we propose to throw aside that language and erect one of our own in the nature of a paper promise to pay a dollar purely of local use. Let us be frank and honest about it. Let us tell the world that we will no longer have for our standard this twenty-five and eight-tenths gold; we will no longer promise what we do not intend to fulfill; we will run the paper-mill and the printing-press; we will take paper and stamp it with the inscription "This is a dollar," and "In God we trust." Who is ambitious to have his portrait put upon this new money? In times past our honored men have been pleased to see their faces stamped on the honored paper of the country; but who stands forward now; where is the champion countenance ambitious to shine upon the new paper, not a dollar, but called a dollar?

OUR ABILITY TO RESUME.

But some gentlemen say you can never return to specie payment; you cannot pay gold if you try it; you never can get back to it. I am not telling you precisely when you can come to it. The preacher does not tell you when you shall reach heaven; but begs you, for your own good, to put your face that way and move on. We have paid six or eight hundred million dollars of the public debt, and yet we profess ourselves unable to so affect our demand notes as to bring them up to par. We have exported in the last eight or ten years $410,000,000 of specie. Do you tell me there is no way known to finance by which we can check that outflow, by which we can retain enough of it to begin paying off our paper?

But, say gentlemen, we are obliged to export gold to pay our foreign indebtedness. Well, you would not have had so much foreign indebtedness had it not been for your expanded paper currency. I want to call your attention to a very important fact, to one which, stated as it has been within the last four or five years by Amasa J. Walker, and afterward by William M. Grosvenor, may be called a discovery in finance. It is this: that the volume of our importations of foreign goods is never regulated to any considerable extent by our tariff; our tariff has never decided how much of foreign goods shall be imported into this country. Draw a horizontal line, divided into sixty portions for the last sixty years. Erect at each end perpendicular lines, upon which you scale the currency per capita and the varying tariffs. Run two irregular lines from left to right, rising or falling to indicate the varying currency per capita and the varying volume of importations. You will find an extraordinary parallelism between the lines. As the volume of currency increases, importations increase, and vice versa. There is scarcely any parallelism between the lines indicating the elevation or depression of the tariff and the aggregate of importations. The parallelism of these two lines of currency and importation is a mathematical demonstration. It is utterly impossible under the laws of mathematics that those two lines should have preserved that parallelism unless importations were governed by currency.

Mr. KELLEY. The fact is contradicted in the last four years of our own history.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. And proved by the last sixty years of our history, as is shown by figures drawn from the Treasury Department. There will be exceptions, of course. Short crops may affect it, foreign disasters may affect it, but only temporarily; there stand the parallel lines.

I read now from Grosvenor's Does Protection Protect:

During the war of 1812 our currency increased from about forty millions to about one hundred millions in 1816, and was then reduced by a general overthrow of banks to about forty-five millions in 1820. In like manner our imports for domestic consumption, which in 1807 had been about seventy millions, as soon as the war closed rose to over one hundred millions, and to one hundred and thirty millions in 1816, and were then reduced to about sixty millions in 1820. From 1820 to 1833 the currency increased a little faster than population, and our imports increased in like proportion. From 1833 to 1837 the currency rose very rapidly to two hundred and twenty-two millions, and the imports were in like manner increased from eighty to one hundred and sixty-nine millions. From 1837 to 1843 the currency was contracted from two hundred and twenty-two to one hundred and twenty-eight millions, and imports shrank from one hundred and sixty-nine to fifty-eight millions. Again from 1843 to 1857 the currency was expanded from one hundred and twenty-eight to four hundred and seventy-four millions, and the gross imports rose from sixty-four to three hundred and sixty millions. In 1857 the currency was violently contracted and imports were instantly reduced.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do you recognize Grosvenor as good authority?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I recognize him as good authority when he gets his figures from the Bureau of Statistics. When he comes to argue free trade I will talk further with him. This is my proposition: Expanded paper stimulates imports, and so long as you have a large volume of inconvertible paper money, so long you will have, extraordinary occasions excepted, heavy importations, and heavy foreign bills to pay.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE DELUSION.

I now come to another department of this investigation. It is said that we never can resume specie payments, and that there is no use in our trying to do so, until we have changed the balance of trade. The common talk about the balance of trade is a delusion from beginning to end. There is no falsehood in figures like the falsehood of the tables of those who talk about the balance of trade. The veteran banker from Wisconsin, [Mr. MITCHELL,] in his exceedingly able speech, demonstrated that the other day in a very few words. I will quote his demonstration, lest some now listening may not have heard it. Suppose that $100,000 worth of goods were started from New York and were sunk in mid-ocean. That being the sole trade of the country, it would appear that we had exported $100,000 more than we had brought into the country, and had thereby made a gain of that much. But suppose that instead of going to the botton the vessel had proceeded to Spain, and had there purchased $150,000 worth of wines, which had sold for $200,000 in the markets of this country. Then the balance of trade would have been adverse, according to the custom-house returns, to the extent of $100,000, although the merchant probably made $50,000 by the operation. The prosperity of the country is made up of the aggregate prosperity of individuals. If every merchant in the country had succeeded as well as that one, then we would have had an enormous adverse balance of trade against us, but everybody would have got rich out of it.

I will follow out that demonstration a little further. Suppose that instead of taking $100,000 worth of goods the merchant had taken $100,000 of gold, which is as much a product of this country as wheat, and had gone to Spain and there had purchased $150,000 worth of wines, or that which would sell for that amount when he got back here. He then would have made $50,000 (less expenses) and the country would have been that much richer. But the custom-house tables would show that we had imported $150,000 worth of goods, exported no merchandise, and had lost our $100,000 of specie.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a single question?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How much would we have gained after we had drunk up that $150,000 worth of wines?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That involves another question. If the gentleman does not like wines I will change it, say, to Spanish wools, which I think they use in Massachusetts.

Mr. COBURN. How does the gentleman show that by this process we have gained gold? Do we not lose our store of gold even if we make money on the gold?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Yes; we have lost the gold, but we have made $50,000 profit on it; and by all the laws of commerce gold will come back to this country when there is a demand for it on this side, arising from legitimate business, as strong as was the demand which took it to Spain.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is not the balance of trade based on gold instead of commerce, and is not that the fallacy of the illustration?

Mr. GARFIELD. Trade and not gold is commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will make another supposition. Suppose the $100,000 worth of goods went to Spain and with the proceeds $150,000 worth of wines were bought. Those wines are taken to Brazil and invested in hides at $200,000, which are brought back to this country and sold for $250,000. The custom-house returns show the exportation of $100,000 and the importation of $250,000, (valuation in Brazil;) a loss to the country, they say, of $100,000, though the merchant has made $150,000, less expenses.

Illustrations can be multiplied. Let me give one in regard to English trade, for it is the balance of trade with England that we are chiefly troubled about. Let the New York merchant send $100,000 worth of goods to Liverpool. He adds 10 per cent. for expenses and 10 per cent. for profit. He sells the goods in Liverpool for $120,000, and on the Liverpool wharf he purchases $120,000 worth of goods, and of course returns them to our custom-house at their valuation on that wharf. After he has got $120,000 worth of English goods he adds 10 per cent. for expenses, which would be $12,000, and 10 per cent for profit, which makes it $144,000, and gets that sum in New York.

Now the custom-house account stands:

Exports	$100,000
Imports	120,000
Adverse balance of trade	20,000

But the merchant's account stands:

Investment	$100,000
Expenses	22,000
	122,000
Proceeds in New York	144,000
Profit	22,000

The custom-house account shows a balance against us of $20,000; the actual trade shows a profit of $22,000. So you may follow the illustrations. And this does not pertain to the United States alone. But the statement I have just read about Liverpool trade is something like the true general condition of our foreign trade. If you count the value of the export on our wharf and the value of the importation on the wharf it leaves, you will always get a balance of trade against us, even though the trade may be unprofitable to us.

Mr. COBURN. How are you going to get the gold back? You have not touched that question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will talk about that in good time.

While upon this point, I wish to submit the following statement, which has been prepared by Dr. Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics:

Total value of imports of merchandise in the twenty-four years, from 1850 to 1873, both inclusive		$8,125,706,392
Total value of domestic exports in same period	$6,205,631,721
Total value of foreign exports in same period	376,788,210
Total exports		6,582,419,931
Excess of imports of merchandise over exports		1,543,286,461
SPECIE AND BULLION.
Exports in twenty-four years above named	$1,425,428,592
Less imports in same period	327,261,818
Net exports		1,098,166,774
Apparent adverse balance of trade in twenty-four years		445,119,687
Average annual balance		18,546,653

Now, sir, if the purchases have been made with any wisdom at all, there has been no adverse balance of trade to any great extent. But you say the gold has gone out of the country. Yes; but it will come back again if the laws of commerce are not defied by our legislation. Yet you may be perfectly certain that gold will not come back in a hurry so long as you have this false and expanded currency.

Now, if the statement I have read as to the balance of trade be true, then besides sending all our specie away we should have had $18,000,000 a year for twenty-four years to pay besides. In that time we should have been not only without a single dollar of specie, but far below zero. Now, how much have we lost? In 1860, according to the best statisticians, we had about $200,000,000. They say that we have now $135,000,000 of gold, and perhaps $10,000,000 of silver. Then we have $145,000,000 of specie, so that we have lost only about $55,000,000 of specie in these twenty-four years. Therefore this apparent deficit of $18,000,000 a year is in a large measure canceled by those elements of trade to which I have referred as being undisclosed by our custom-house returns.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest whether we have mined any gold in the mean time?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Exactly. Gold is of course just as much one of our exports as wheat, or pork, or beef, or cotton. We produce gold in immense quantities, beyond any need of our currency at all; and therein lies one of our offenses against the laws of political economy. While all the conditions of the problem were favorable to us, we have thrown away the blessings Providence laid before us and persisted in swimming about in the sea of paper currency.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Is not one of the main causes of the constant flowing out of gold the fact that we have no use for gold here; that it has ceased to be a part of our currency, and so goes where there is use for it?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Exactly. We have, as the phrase goes, demonetized gold. It is the cheapest thing this country produces to-day, and the one we can best afford to export; it is the one that we export more cleanly and thoroughly than we do any other product. You have by law, so far as you can, said that there shall be only two uses for gold, to pay customs duties and to pay the interest on the public debt. A few merchants use it in their trade in New York; but, so far as you can, you have prevented its use in any but those two directions. It is true, a small amount is used in the arts and manufactures. Gold having become cheap here as it is, the commercial world most readily seizes upon it to pay its balances with.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that a careful comparison of the amounts used for paying imports and the amounts used for paying interest with the actual amount of gold estimated to be in the country will show that those elements keep pace with each other; that we have just as much gold as we have those uses for, and no more.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I think we have a little more than is required by those uses. I think that fifteen or twenty million dollars of gold, shuffled back and forth, will pay all our duties, because it is constantly being exchanged between the merchants and the Treasury.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman will allow me to remind him that a portion of the people of the United States still use gold as money.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Yes; I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I have a memorandum upon that point somewhere. In spite of your legal-tender laws, in spite of your unconstitutional legislation, in spite of your adverse balance of trade, which you say will forever forbid us to come back to specie payments, gold and silver are still the basis of business in Texas, within a day or two's reach of you. So, too, California and all the Pacific States have stubbornly held to the gold standard from the beginning. California has never been debauched on this subject until you began to authorize gold banks; and now she has one or two banks with five times as much paper as they have gold in their vaults. She has begun the downward course, though I do not think she will keep on; for I think she knows what money is. If any State ought to know that, it is Texas; for the wildest dreams about the supreme value of a cent's worth of paper with figures on it was thoroughly tested in that State during her short financial history. Read Gouge's Fiscal History of Texas. I shall be glad to lend it to the inflationists.

But I have another fact for the men who trouble themselves about the adverse balance of trade. During the eight years from 1858 to 1865, inclusive, the trade of Great Britain in merchandise alone (specie excluded) was as follows:

Imports	£1,483,250,000
Exports	1,105,000,000
Adverse balance of trade	378,250,000

More marvelous still: instead of exporting specie to pay the balance, her net imports of specie were £23,000,000. Reduced to Federal currency the annual adverse balance of trade was $250,781,250.* In the same eight years the excess of exports from France (reversing British experience) was £96,500,000, and the net importation of specie was £49,000,000, leaving forty-seven millions unpaid; for, according to the custom house, the balance of trade was against Great Britain to the extent of £378,000,000 within eight years. Why is Great Britain bankrupt according to these financiers?

Many gentlemen would say Great Britain must have sent out all her gold to pay that balance. No, sir, with the balance of merchandise against her to an enormous amount, gold was coming in. Why, then, do gentlemen talk about adverse balances in merchandise?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BARRY in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PHELPS. I move by unanimons consent that he be allowed to proceed to the conclusion of his speech.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I hope my friend from Mississippi [Mr. NILES] will allow me to proceed in his time.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Instead of exporting specie to pay the balance of trade against her, Great Britain was receiving specie.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield the floor to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. NILES. If the House extends the time of the gentleman from Connecticut without deduction from my time, I do not object.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not want to trespass any further upon the good nature of my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Connecticut is making a most interesting speech, and I move that he be allowed to go on without regard to anybody's time—that his time be extended until he concludes his speech.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Instead of sending out any specie to pay her immense adverse balance, Great Britain received £23,000,000 of specie in that time, making a total excess of exports, specie and all, of £401,000,000. It can be explained, sir, by these same suggestions I have made in regard to our own balances of trade. The declared values at home and the declared values abroad, properly understood, explain those balances to a considerable extent. The returns outside the custom-house from English capital invested abroad explain the rest.

Mr. MERRIAM. I should like to have it understood that it was the carrying trade of the world which England did which brought in that gold.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I know it was the business she did; that is what everybody says.

Mr. MERRIAM. And it shows——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I say it does show, and that is what I began by saying, that this custom-house balance of trade was the most deceptive thing in all finance.

Nay, more; England in sixteen years, from 1851 to 1865 inclusive, according to the official returns of the board of trade, imported £650,000,000 of merchandise more than she exported! I know we can go to work and explain it, but I leave it to you, gentlemen, who are troubled by the little balance against us, to explain it; and the States of California and Texas as well as Great Britain are examples of the possibility of retaining a largely metallic currency against an apparent adverse balance of trade.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has expressed its deliberate opinion that we shall continue for years to come to send railroad and other securities—that is to say, to borrow money across the water; wherever money is cheap the American people will borrow it. Money is cheap in Great Britain and elsewhere, not because they print a great deal of lies, but because wealth is abundant, capital is abundant, and the home uses are limited. She has more capital than she can profitably use at home. The use of capital is cheap—not the mere exponent, the counter, or medium of exchanging capital. Her capital is ready to go abroad, and our great railroad enterprises are thankful when English capitalists come over and say we have more capital to spare to you to build your railroads. Do they bring us the two or ten millions of dollars in gold in their pocket-books? No; they carry some little pieces of paper which bring it to order, but no actual money of theirs may ever be visible on the ground.

The New York Chamber of Commerce wisely tells us this apparent balance against us is likely to continue indefinitely, so long as the older countries have spare capital to lend at low rates, and we make money by it, or Chicago makes by borrowing from Connecticut. Are we then going to postpone resumption indefinitely, to wait until we can get a custom-house balance in our favor?

SOME EFFECTS OF EXPANSION.

Admit for the sake of the argument that an issue of six hundred millions of greenbacks might serve for the currency of the country, without apparent depreciation, what would be the result? First, the banks, being at liberty to pay greenbacks instead of specie, would keep little or no specie. It would leave the country, because the superior currency leaves and the inferior remains always; and as commodities, deprived of half their uses, gold and silver would seek higher markets. Secondly, in the case of an unusual demand for specie we should have a smaller reservoir to draw upon, the price would fluctuate violently, and international trade being violently affected would react heavily upon domestic trade. Thirdly, we should have no protection against fluctuations. True, elasticity would be lacking, and recourse would be had to the printing press for still more paper. Fourthly, the gain could be made only once.

HOW TO MAKE THE NEXT FORCED LOAN.

What would you do in case of a great war? You took advantage of the great war necessity to issue legal-tender money—paper dollars—and make them a legal tender. They drove out legitimate money; you made the substitution—made a forced loan. Now, suppose us plunged into another great war, with a similar necessity upon us. What can you do then? You have exhausted your remedy. The country is full of a paper irredeemable legal tender, and you cannot take that great step which was in reality a forced loan to the extent of four hundred millions. It is said that there was once upon a time a disease among the dogs, and one of the doctors discovered that by cutting off the dog's tail very closely you could cure the disease. Another said there was only one fault to be found with the remedy, it could never be repeated on the same dog. So with your legal-tender issue. What would you do in another great emergency?

MORE CURRENCY.

But France and England, they tell us, have more currency and more money. Mr. Speaker, you cannot reason in this matter from population or wealth absolutely, though they aid us in coming to a right conclusion. A barbarous nation holds more money in proportion to its wealth than more civilized nations. The nations most accomplished in financial science, making most use of deposits, checks, &c., need less money. Great Britain has scarcely more than she had fifty years ago.

Currency in France:	Francs.
Coin and bullion	4,000,000,000
Metallic reserve	759,962,419
Bank of France notes in circulation	2,807,689,625
Aggregate actual circulation	6,047,727,206

But you notice that while their gold and silver is four billion seven hundred and fifty-nine millions, their notes in circulation are two billion eight hundred and seven millions. The specie is in the proportion of 47 to 28 of paper in France. I have no objection to "more money" in that proportion.

Let me give the latest statement of the currency of Great Britain:

Gold in circulation	£84,551,000
Silver in circulation	15,000,000
Bronze coin in circulation	1,148,000
Coin in reserve	15,774,366
Total money	116,473,366
Total bank circulation	56,314,274
Excess of bank-notes over coin reserves	40,539,908

Of this forty millions excess over coin reserves, sixteen millions are based on bullion, leaving less than 17 per cent. of the total circulation unrepresented by a metallic reserve.

When we are told of the "more money" in Great Britain, I point to the fact that she has two pounds of metallic or real money to one of paper promises. I hope to see "more money" in the same proportions in this country. Bear in mind that of the paper promises out 83 per cent. are backed by coin or bullion.

I have no objection to "more money." I ask "more money." I hope everybody may "have money." I hope money may be abundant through the country. And I object to more promises because I want "more money." But I insist that you shall do nothing to the notes already out; that you shall perform the first duty of a Government in making notes as good as money; and then we can have as much of it as you please. If it is in harmony with the currency of the world, when it is in superfluity, it will flow abroad; and when there is a scarcity here the money will come back. We shall be in connection with the great centers of commerce and of trade. As we stand now it is like pouring water upon an isolated column of water. The rise is rapid and instant, the fluctuation violent. But pour any quantity into an open pond or lake, which has a channel connecting it with the sea, and you perceive no difference. So add five hundred millions to the volume of what we call our money and you would derange all values, balloon enterprises, and land us in a short time in a common bankruptcy and ruin. But pour in five or six hundred millions at a time when we are enjoying a right currency, even if it be of gold, and it will temporarily flood the market; but it soon goes into the great sea of the commerce of the world and the balance is soon restored. We do not want more credit; yet that is what men are clamoring for; more credit, not more money. They want the Government to shovel some hundreds of millions to them. Why so? Do you carry it to your district and to my district, and give it to your people and to my people? No, sir; men are there wanting to borrow, borrow, borrow, and we are asked to legislate to satisfy their insatiate desire to borrow.

Now, sir, as individuals, as districts, as towns, as counties, as States, as a nation, as railroad corporations or manufacturing corporations, we are all in debt more that sound economy and sound policy can justify. That is the calamity with us now. We have labored at inflation; we have inflated all business; we are in debt and our credit has been extended, and yet men are praying here for more debt, more credit to build up what is called wealth.

Sir, there is hardly anything in figures, next to the "balance of trade," more deceptive than those figures which go to show how the country has grown in the last twelve years, and how much more prosperous we are although we have buried the savings of a generation in a great war which was not only unproductive but infinitely destructive. Sir, we grow in spite of all disasters, but we have made no such progress as the figures prove. I can get rich, any man can get rich from month to month, if I increase my indebtedness 10 per cent. a month and inventory only one side of the account. And I can grow rich simply by calling myself rich from year to year; that is really the source of a large portion of our so-called increase of wealth.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will ask the gentleman whether if free banking be authorized, as the bill proposes, there is any probability that it will lead to a dangerous increase of the currency?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will come to that in a few minutes. More money will increase the margin of fluctuation which every business man takes into account. My excellent friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has illustrated this. The variation between paper and gold must be taken into account by every business man. If it be 1, 2, or 3 per cent., then he says, "I must add 5 per cent. to cover all this and the risk of more." The greater the fluctuation the greater must be the margin to cover it, and the business man gets it in the end out of the laboring classes and the farmers.

AGRICULTURISTS THE GREATEST SUFFERERS.

Now, sir, I am more astonished to see this increase of currency supported by members coming from the farming regions than by any others. It astonishes me to see men representing agricultural communities clamoring for more irredeemable paper money, when the great sufferers in this country by irredeemable paper are the agriculturists of all classes.

Sir, it is clearly established by political economy that the prices of all these exportable products are fixed abroad. Our surplus products go to England, France, or elsewhere, and the price we get there determines the price which the farmer gets in Iowa, unless, indeed, local disturbances or derangements of transportation exceptionally interfere. Your pork, your flour, your wheat, your corn, your cotton, are sold abroad, and the price you get in London or Liverpool settles the price the Iowa farmer or Georgia planter gets eventually, subject to intervening temporary disturbances. He sells at a gold price adjusted in markets governed by a specie standard. I know how gentlemen answer this. They say that it is true the farmer gets his gold in Liverpool; but when it comes over here he turns it into paper with a gain of 10, 12, or 15 per cent., as the market may be.

Well, sir, the great depreciation of money here is much more than 12, 13, or 15 per cent.; it is probably 40 or 50 per cent. The farmer in Iowa is governed in the price he gets by the price which is got in Liverpool, and the premium on gold does not cover the difference in his cost of living; he has to pay 30, 40, or 50 per cent. more for everything else than he would if our currency were based on a gold standard. Is it not true that in a large portion of the West in 1860 you got eighty, ninety, and a hundred cents a bushel for your wheat, or perhaps a hundred and ten? You who are farmers know that was so. You get something like those same prices now, and yet you will bear me witness that your machines for working your farms, that your laborers, that a large portion of all the articles you buy and consume, are about from 50 to 100 per cent. above what they were in 1860.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is the result of the tariff.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman says that is the result of the tariff. Sir, it would take me another hour to convince him of his mistake, but I think I could do it. The tariff has some little influence on this matter, but we have no tariff now so much higher than that of 1860 as to account for this difference. I know there is a general depreciation in the world owing to the great production of gold and silver, and the expanded issue of paper money elsewhere; but that is not enough to cover all this difference.

The farming interest has been complaining for six or eight years bitterly every year that it could not make money. Of course it cannot make money; for it is bound down, chained down to a gold and silver currency when it sells, while it is compelled to do a large portion of its purchasing in a depreciated "paper money."

You thought that you gained a victory when you passed the transportation bill the other day. I tell you that the great speculative railroad interests in this country gained a victory a hundred-fold greater when you passed the $400,000,000 legal-tender bill; so that they may if possible revive their Southern Pacific and Northern Pacific, the Grand Central, their Grand Eastern, their Grand Western, and their Transcontinental Railroad schemes, and find money to float them. These are the men who gained a victory in this House within six weeks; the great speculators of the country, who want inflated prices, and what they call abundant money; and your farmers' bill will turn to ashes within your grasp; and your railroad speculators will go on drawing in their money for bonds which never will be redeemed, involving the farmers ultimately in ruin and despair. Now, if I read political economy aright—and I am not ashamed to say that I read a great deal of it in books, but I get some from merchants and "practical men"—that will be the result of your policy.

AN ELASTIC YARD-STICK.

It is said that we want an elastic currency. No, sir; we do not. We may want more half-bushels, more quart and pint cups, more yard-sticks, but we do not want them made of India rubber, nor do you of the West and South. You do not want a yard-stick that will measure thirty-eight inches to-day, and thirty-four inches to-morrow. You may want more yard-sticks, but you want them all of the same standard. In my State we have carefully preserved in glass cases the standard weights and measures which the General Government has sent us for the use of our people, and we go there and test our yard-sticks and peck-measures, and pint cups with great care. Now, I am willing that we shall have more pint cups and half-bushels and yard-sticks, but I want the standard unimpaired. I want the twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of gold to the dollar which you promised me I should get in the markets of the world. But you will not give it to me; and what is more you will not tell me when you will give it to us, nor will you tell me when you will try to give it to us. I want the standard of value restored.

THE PENDING BILL.

I cannot vote for the pending bill, although I know it has some good things in it. One is that feature introduced by my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] which provides that we shall begin to issue $2,000,000 every month of gold notes as a substitute for an equal amount of legal-tender notes, the gold notes to be redeemable in two years. So far the bill is good, for it plants a mustard-seed of resumption; it begins to look toward a real money by and by.

But I am not satisfied with the general provisions of the bill. I am not satisfied with any bill that does not keep in view the great primary duty of returning to the true standard of value. Talk to me about practical redemption. Here [holding up a national-bank note] is a promise to pay five dollars; a promise made by a bank, and secured by United States bonds deposited in the Treasury here in Washington. It is as good as you can make paper. You propose to redeem it in another paper five-dollar note, which is a promise of the United States to pay. But it is a demand-note promise, and not a solemn bond with annual interest. Yet you call redemption the payment of one note secured by a Government bond in another legal-tender note not so secured. Now, I do not understand that to be redemption. I had before a good promise to pay, backed by the Government. I have now, after the so-called redemption, a good promise to pay backed by the Government. And that is what you call practical redemption. I have seen something very like that on the Pacific Railroad, but they called it "three-card monte" there. But I did not see where the profit came in to anybody except to the gambler.

Now, when you shall have $400,000,000 of legal-tenders, and about $400,000,000 of bank currency, the bank currency secured and more than secured by Government bonds laid by here in Washington, what is the use of talking about the redemption of one by the other? What is the good of it, and who cares to redeem in that way? You have, therefore, in this bill very wisely relieved the banks from the necessity of keeping on hand a reserve to meet their own circulation. If I had a pocketful of their notes I would not walk across the street to change them for legal-tenders. I do not ask you to keep any legal-tenders for the banks to redeem the notes of the banks.

You have carefully let alone the provision of the present law requiring the banks to hold a reserve to meet their deposits. They will be sure, as will financiers, to do that any way. The fact is, that as you have left the real standard of value and begin to deal in inconvertible and irredeemable paper, I cannot understand any gain in all the shuffles and shakes that change one kind of paper for another. I do not get anything when you have shifted paper all day long; I have no money in the end.

But would you do nothing, they say? Well, sir, if you wish to say that you will establish more banks in the West and in the South, and pari passu with their establishment withdraw an equal amount of currency from the East, that you can do without inflation. I cannot vote for inflation even if you take circulation out of my own State. I will vote every dollar of paper out of my town and State before I will consent to two cents of expansion, if I have to stay at home out of Congress all the rest of my life.

I believe that you are taking steps here more fraught with disaster to this country than were contained in that evil Nebraska bill which was big with controversy and with war. You have started upon the downward road to repudiation. By long climbing you were within a mile of the mountain-top; now, discouraged by temporary clamor for more money, you are traveling a mile down again. When will you have the courage to go back? Will you ever find it easier? Ah! how easy it is to make "more money!" By and by, when you have made business feverish and excited, and apparently prosperous, this clamor of wild speculators will come again to these Halls, demanding "More money!" "More money!" "More money!" Will you have more virtue then than you have now? Will you ever have a better time than you have had this winter to say, "We stop here?" The recent financial disaster—not the worst that might have happened—threw us upon our backs in the dust; it disarranged business and brought down values; and it afforded a good opportunity for us to take hold resolutely for a return to specie payments. It was this that was demanded by your great business men. You now propose to give your drunken patient more brandy to make him strong again. He will rise up and engage in wilder speculations than ever before. By and by final disaster and bankruptcy will come, and then you will be driven back to the real honest standard of money again. But do not let us pay that price.

Gentlemen, I repeat there is no road to resumption through expansion, except the road that goes through repudiation. If I am not altogether wild in this matter—I have with me the boards of trade, the chambers of commerce, the great merchants and bankers and financiers of the country—if I am not altogether wild in this matter, this is the decisive, the turning point in the national finances, and, what is of infinitely less importance, a turning point in the history of political parties. Many men who long for political reorganization have looked eagerly for the action which was to bring it about. Sir, parties are not called into existence by a proclamation. Parties create themselves. They grow out of some profound belief, some great moral purpose. You are furnishing that belief and that purpose today by making it necessary for men to rally without regard to party lines for the defense of sound economical principles and the preservation of the honor of the country. There is no man so good that I will vote for him for any office, from President down to constable, if he is unsound upon this financial question. There is no man so dear to me that I will not fight him from the word "go" until the election closes, if he is unsound on this question. And I know very many men who agree with me on this point. But I do not care whether there be five or fifty or five hundred; I am planted as firmly on this ground as in the days when I was a radical abolitionist, though I could not see the possibility of triumph within a hundred years. I believe I know what is right upon this matter; and I have no doubt that what is right will come uppermost in this country; that the people will sustain it. I am about done.

I submit in conclusion several propositions which I have hastily sketched, and with which I leave the question:

1. The precious metals furnish the best standard of values for a medium of exchange.

2. The proper currency is one composed of gold, silver, and paper convertible on presentation into coin.

3. The national Government should steadily aim at a resumption of specie payment, because that is right, and because it has so pledged itself again and again when it was most anxious to get credit.

4. The only path to resumption through an expansion of the volume of inconvertible paper money is through explosion and repudiation.
